PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

- Rice Diet For Skin Diseases.
- Eczema and psoriasis have been cured by an exclusive diet of rice, bread, butter and water.
- Three times daily and nothing else.
- J. Duncan Buckley in the Medical Record said that this diet should be carried out with exactness in all its details in order to obtain results. The nature and severity of the cases must be taken into consideration in determining the length of time the diet must be continued. Certain cases recover in a specified time, and others require a much longer time.
- The rice must be well boiled in water, not soggy, and must be eaten hot with a fork, not a spoon, to secure the action of the saliva during thorough mastication. Water should be taken freely, but not when food is in the mouth, and a pint of hot water should be taken before the morning and evening meals.
- In acute eczema a marked improvement is noted within five days, while psoriasis requires long periods.
- Milk must not be taken with the rice, nor must the patient take coffee or chocolate.

Keeping Track of Ships.

In the course of a year more than a dozen ponderous books are filled at Lloyd's with nothing but the names of ships, their captains and the dates on which they touch and leave port. Every known vessel in the world of more than a hundred tons register has its record in them, and the underwriters can easily turn to the name of any British or foreign ship and tell approximately where she is at the moment—London Times.

Captured by a Girl

By RUTH GRAHAM

Ned Mason when the United States entered the great world's war enlisted in the army and in time sailed from New York in a troopship for France. There he and his regiment were placed in a camp for instruction, and eventually they were all put on the fighting line. Ned was a good German scholar, but he didn't know a word of French. One day Ned, with his regiment, was charging a German trench. The Americans pushed clear over the trench and some distance beyond. The country was open, and here and there was a dwelling house. There was no organized force of Germans to resist the Americans, and they pushed on nearly a mile from their base. But presently a number of helmets were seen in their rear, and it was evident that unless they got back pretty quickly they would be captured. They broke ranks, each man shifting for himself.

Mason in his flight ran through the yard of a house which was between him and the Germans, screening him from their sight. Coming to a well, he got into it and, catching hold of the bucket, let himself go down with it. He was safe from the Germans, but there were disadvantages in his position. There are more comfortable places than a well of cold water.

Nevertheless Mason remained where he was till he heard no near sounds; then he began to think of leaving his hiding place. He did not know whether he was within the French or the German lines. If the former, he might help himself out by the bucket rope and rejoin his command; if the latter, by leaving his hiding place he would surely be captured.

He dreaded capture by the Germans more than death, but being frozen to death in cold water was not to be considered. After enduring his situation as long as possible he pulled himself up by the bucket rope, bracing himself by a foot on each side of the well, and thus reached the well house. After resting a few minutes he ventured to put his head up where he could see about him.

It happened that a young girl was coming to the well for water and was within a few feet of it when Ned raised his head up. She gave a shriek and retreated a few steps. Was she French or German? Ned did not know. He hoped she was French, but since he did not speak French he was obliged to explain his dripping presence in the German tongue.

The girl listened to him for a few moments, then broke in, beckoning him to follow her. She led the way to the house, put him in a room and locked the door. Presently it was opened and some dry clothing was thrown in to him.

It was now evening, and Ned made up his mind that he would remain quietly where he was confined and during the night would make an attempt to escape. He knew that he was on the second floor of the house, for he had mounted a stairway. After it was quite dark he went to the window to reconnoiter. The blinds were closed, and he opened them as softly as possible, hoping not to attract attention by the act. Directly below him was the roof of a one story addition to the house. He resolved to go through the window, drop to the ground and take his chances to escape to the French lines in the darkness. He had put one leg out when he heard a click from a window at an angle with the one he was leaving. Looking up, he could discern in the dim light the girl who had captured him pointing a pistol at him. He at once retreated to the room he had left.

Ned gave up hope of making an escape through that window. The girl was doubtless watching him till the arrival of troops to take him in charge and would not leave her post till they came. He thought of leaving by the window, letting her shoot him if she liked. Better death than a German prisoner, and possibly she, being a woman, would not have the heart to shoot him. While he was trying to make up his mind what to do he heard the tramp of men without, then footsteps coming up the stairs. The door was thrown open by his capturer, and in the doorway stood Tom Bradley, one of the sergeants of his company. Bradley started back in surprise, then, looking at the girl, said:

"Is this your German prisoner?"
"Out, monsieur."
"Well, you've captured an American."
"An American?"
"Mon Dieu, mademoiselle! Why the dickens didn't you tell me you were French?"
"But you spoke German."
"That was because I don't know French."
"He's your prisoner," said the sergeant to the girl. "What shall we do with him?"
"What you please," said the girl.
"Well, I shall march him to his trench and prefer charges against him for desertion in order to flirt with a French girl."

He marched Ned downstairs, placed him in the center of eight men and took him to his comrades, those guarding him laughing and chaffing him by the way. On arriving at their destination Ned gave an account of the incident, much to the merriment of all who heard him.

Ned was told that the ground first captured by the Americans and then lost was retaken, and the well in which he took refuge was included in the American lines.

An Incident of '48

By RICHARD MAPKLEY

It is now about seventy years ago that the European kings were trembling in their beds for fear of losing their crowns. Today they are again shivering, and the crown of the most autocratic of the lot, the czar of Russia, has tumbled off his head. That was a time when the United States acquired citizens of the Carl Schurz stamp, who declined longer to put up with the divine right of kings.

It was at a time when those men who could not get away were being rounded up for imprisonment or death that Count Herbert von Blitzen, a trusted friend of the king of Prussia, was snatching along the Unter den Linden, in Berlin. A lady walked not far behind him, keeping him in sight. The count turned into one of the most select restaurants for a bite and a glass of wine. The lady entered the same place and took a seat near the count's table.

The proprietor, seeing a woman alone in his restaurant, went to her and in a low tone said to her that unattended ladies were not allowed in his restaurant. The lady replied that she would soon be joined by her husband. At this the proprietor apologized and turned up a chair opposite the lady.

Count von Blitzen, not hearing what passed between the proprietor and the lady, stared at her. She endured this for some time, when those about her were thunderstruck to see her take up a glass of wine that she had been sipping and throw the contents in the count's face. Then she said:

"Herr, I have been insulted by you and have resented the insult. My husband will soon join me and will be ready to give you satisfaction."

The count was dumfounded at this unusual action in a woman and one having the bearing and the apparel of a lady and knew not what to say. The lady, as soon as her indignation permitted her to speak, said further:

"It is not pleasant for me to remain here, having attracted so much attention." She took a card from a portemanteau and tossed it on the count's table, then without another word she walked out of the restaurant with all the dignity of a queen. The count took up the card and read "Mrs. Elliott Von Schoonhoven, New York, U. S. A.," with her Berlin address.

Von Blitzen saw at once that he must challenge the lady's husband. The resenting of his conduct had been so public, and sympathy is always with a woman in such a case, should he fail to act he would be ostracized. Within a few hours the episode would be all over Berlin. He at once sent a friend to the address given to challenge Mr. Von Schoonhoven.

The friend was received by Mrs. Von Schoonhoven, who said that her husband had been delayed from meeting her at the restaurant by having met friends from New York. He was still with his friends, but had left instructions with his wife to make arrangements for granting the count satisfaction. The terms were arranged between the count's second and Mrs. Von Schoonhoven. The principals were to meet the next morning, foils for weapons.

Von Blitzen did not like fighting a man that neither he nor his second had seen, but feared for his reputation if he demurred. He accepted the situation reluctantly.

The count's party were on the ground first, and a few minutes later his opponent appeared unattended. She wore a cloak which concealed her figure, but threw it off while advancing, uncovering fencing costume.

"Count," she said, "my husband is unavoidably detained. Why so I will explain later. I am compelled to resent your insulting stare."

Taking a foil from an attendant of the count's, she called to him to put himself on guard. Some one handed him a foil, and he took it mechanically without considering what he did. In fact, he was so disturbed at the turn the affair had taken that he was more engrossed with what he should do than with any thought of his defense. All he did was to parry the woman's thrusts till suddenly she disarmed him, sending his foil spinning in the air. Then she said:

"Count, your life is at my disposal. Unless you do what I ask you will not be alive after thirty seconds."

"What do you ask? What does all this mean?" asked the count.

"I am not Mrs. Von Schoonhoven. I am the American wife of August von Hempfel. The reason my husband can not defend my honor is because he is in prison for complicity in the late revolution. The price of your life is that you shall secure from the king his release and full restoration to citizenship."

"I am not the king of Prussia. I cannot pardon any one."

"You can promise to do so if it is possible. I know that anything you ask of the king will be granted. And all Berlin knows this too. These gentlemen know the terms and will be my witnesses."

"Very well," said the count; "I will do my best."

The party dispersed, and the next day a messenger came to Frau von Hempfel, saying that the king would pardon her husband if he would agree to leave Prussia. This was agreed to, and Von Hempfel was released. He was one of those stalwarts of 1848 who were driven to America for resisting kingly authority. Will what they failed to accomplish be perfected in 1917 or shortly after? We shall see.
