MADE THE WORD MEAN MUCH

All the English Pretty Bulgarian Understood was "London," but She Gave It Decided Expression.

It is curious that the name London is more generally known the world over than the name England is. In commercial circles "London" stands for most articles of English manufacture. In all the East it represents a nation. The author of "Under the Red Crescent" who was a surgeon of the Turkish army in 1877, found that in the near East, no farther away than Bulgaria, "London" served to identify him. It did even more than that in a conversational way, as he tells us in his book.

My first landlord—who was landlord in name only, for of course I never paid him any rent—was a Bulgarian, he says, and his daughter was one of the few pretty women that I ever saw in Bulgaria. Conversation with her, however, was restricted by our ignorance of each other's language, for I knew scarcely any Bulgarian, and the only word of English that she could say was "London." Whenever I saw that girl she would show her white teeth with a charming smile, flash her big, black eyes, and with beautiful irrelevance ejaculate: "London!"

Whether she knew what London meant I cannot say, but her limited vocabulary expressed more in its way than the gushing phrases of many more brilliant talkers. When she said "London" with a bright air of welcome and a frank smile as I came home at night tired out with my day's work, I knew that she meant "Good evening, doctor! I hope you haven't had a very hard day today; and see, here is your toast and coffee ready."

When she uttered the word with a backward turn of the head and with a pretty glance as she passed out of the door, it was very evident that she was really saying: "Good night now, doctor! Pleasant dreams to you, and I hope a Russian shell won't find you in the morning."—Youth's Companion.

NO DAINTY DISHES SERVED

"Coarse Fare" All That is Offered to Diners Who Celebrate the Birthday of Samuel Johnson.

An unusual celebration is the dinner in honor of Dr. Samuel Johnson, most distinguished English writer of the eighteenth century, given for many years on the anniversary of his birth at Litchfield, where he was born in 1709. Literary men from all over England assemble at the banquet and the menu is always the same—the "coarse fare" beloved by the author. Americans would call it a square meal with all the trimmings, for the dishes specified are: beefsteak pudding with kidneys, haunch of mutton, oysters and mushrooms, apple pie with cream and toasted cheese, ale and punch, to be followed by a dish of strong tobacco and a church-warden pipe for each surviving guest. This is strong meat for a strong man and a Litchfield Johnson dinner is always a "stag" affair. The house in St. Mary's square where Johnson was born is now a museum and library of rare first editions of "Rasselas," the "Adventurer" and Johnson's political tracts and poetical works, as well as about 40 different editions of Boswell's "Life."

England's Gleaning Bell.

The "gleaning bell" is known in some places—as at Driffield, Yorks—as the "harvest bell," and is sounded at five in the morning and seven in the evening to mark the hours of labor in the fields.

Among the old records in the parish chest at Barrow-on-Humber is an instruction to the parish clerk "to ring a bell every working day morning and evening at sun-setting until harvest be fully ended, and for this service each of the cottagers shall give him two peck of wheat."

The clerk at Lyddington, Rutland, is entitled to charge each adult gleaner 1d. for ringing the "gleaning bell."—London Chronicle.

Onions a Disinfectant.

Much has been said about the virtues of the onion, but few know of its use as a disinfectant.

An onion cut in half and set in a room will attract to itself all manner of germs, leaving the air sweet and pure; it is therefore most valuable in cases of infection. You should take care, however, to burn the onion afterward.

No part of an onion should ever be used for domestic purposes after having been allowed to lie about overnight. The eating of raw onions is a great personal protective in time of epidemic, and if taken with cucumbers the breath is left innocent of any objectionable odor.

Beecher's Poetic Fancy.

I like best a forest of mingled trees, ash, maple, oak, beech, hickory and evergreens with birches growing along the edges of the brook that carries itself through the roots and stones toward the willows that grow in yonder meadow. It should be deep and somber, in some directions running off into shadowy recesses and coverts beyond all footsteps. In such a wood there is endless variety. It will breathe as many voices to your fancy as might be brought from any organ beneath the pressure of Handel's hands. Handel and Beethoven always remind me of such a wood.

THE HAND OF FATE By HILDA MORRIS.

THE BURGLAR By GERALD ST. ETIENNE.

It was raining that morning and a gray pall of cloud seemed to hang over Cissy's empty day that stretched ahead. Of course, she should not have felt bored with so many things to do—dusting, cleaning, sewing all the tasks demanded by the care of her brother Tom's new house. But she was bored. Girls of twenty-two want more than household tasks to dream of, and more than blank gray landscapes to look out upon.

Tom's house was a new and attractive one, built at the very edge of a new "addition."

Cissy stopped to lean upon her broom and wipe away a tear as she gazed out at the flat prospect. If only something would happen! Anything to break the monotony. She strained her eyes to look down the road that led toward the city. If someone would even drive past it would be something. And she looked as she saw the faint speak of an approaching automobile.

It was a miserable day to be abroad, the roads were deep with mud and puddles. But the low yellow racer came on at a good pace, apparently disregarding anything so trivial as the weather.

"Why, it's Morton Sims' car!" Cissy said aloud to herself. "I wonder what he's doing out here."

Morton Sims was the brother of Tom's fiancée. Cissy had met him once or twice in town.

He got out and pulled and puffed; he got in again and tried to over-ride fate; he got behind and tried to push, but the car stuck fast. Cissy watched, in a growing flutter of interest and determination.

"If he can't get it out," she murmured to herself, "perhaps he'll want to come in here to phone or something. I ought to ask him to." Very shyly she opened the front door and called to him.

"You seem to be stuck," she said. "Would you like to come in and phone for another car to pull you out?"

"Why, Miss Morrow!" he exclaimed, turning from his inspection of the yellow car. "I didn't know that you lived here! Yes, I do seem to be stuck fast, and I should like to use your phone, if you don't mind."

The phone was in the hall, and Cissy fluttered back to the fire while he used it.

"They can't send out another car for an hour or so," he explained. "I don't want to be a nuisance, Miss Morrow. I'm afraid—"

"Oh, you must stay here by the fire!" she exclaimed quickly. "You look soaked through now. Why do you drive on such an awful day, anyhow?"

He laughed a little bitterly. "Because I was bored. This is a holiday, you know, and the office is closed, and my rooms are awfully bleak and gloomy on a day like this. A fellow gets lonely sometimes."

"Yes, I know," she assented quickly, and then there fell an odd silence between them.

"You have a pleasant place here," he commented. "It's Tom's, I suppose. Christine has told me about it, but I never knew exactly where it was. Christine is awfully in love with your brother."

"Of course! Who wouldn't be?" she laughed back. "And Tom is awfully in love with your sister, too. And so am I."

"I'm sure you'll get on together." "Oh, yes, but I shan't stay with them. It wouldn't be right. Young married people ought to have their homes to themselves. I shall go away."

"Where?" he asked, as if it were a matter of vital concern to him. "Oh, I don't know yet. To be a nurse, perhaps, or a teacher."

Cissy's eyes were on the fire, and she did not know that he was watching her, noting the little quiver of her chin as she spoke.

"Oh, I wouldn't do that," he urged a little awkwardly. "Nurses have an awfully hard time, and I can't imagine you as a teacher. There's just one thing that you ought to do, and that is—"

"What?" Cissy thought she knew what he was going to say, and her color deepened. "You ought to be keeping a house of your own, and making it look like this one. You ought to be married."

"Oh, of course," she laughed. "That is what they say of every girl." "Yes, but you are different. You haven't known me very long, Cissy, but I have felt, ever since that day that Christine first introduced us, as though I had known you from the beginning of time. I've watched you everywhere. I've dreamed about you, and—yes, even written poetry that I didn't have the courage to send. And I've asked Christine so many questions that she thinks I'm eaten up with curiosity. I guess there's no use trying to conceal it, Cissy; I'm in love with you. I have been for a long time!"

Cissy could not look away from the fire; her eyes were too full of lust and wonder for even him to see them. She spoke in a strange, trembling voice that, for happiness, she should not have recognized as her own.

"How very strange!" she said. "Because—because I've felt the very same way about you!"

And outside, in the rain, the yellow car sank deeper into the mud that held it like the strong detaining hand of Fate. (Copyright, 1919, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

A man may be slow and sure, but it's different with a girl.
