U. S. Congress is Called to Meet May 19.

Washington, May 7.—President Wilson issued a call by cable today for a special session of congress to meet Monday, May 19.

Secretary Tumulty, in making the announcement, said it would be impossible, of course, for the president to be here on the opening day. The day fixed for the special session was much earlier than Democratic leaders had expected.

White house officials said that in naming an early date for the session President Wilson was guided by the advice of Secretary Glass as to the necessity of passing annual appropriation measures which failed in the closing days of the last session.

He Didn't Figure to Last for 188 Years.

Chicago, May 8.—Squire James, colored, who claims to be 118 years old, was taken to the Oak Forest infirmary today by the police.

"I was born in Salem, S. C.," he told the police. "I was born in slavery; married in slavery and had my wife and children taken from me."

"I thought I had enough money saved to last me out, but I never figured that I was going to last this long."

About two weeks ago his funds gave out and he is unable to work.

Last Yanks Leave France in August.

Washington May 7.—Secretary Baker announced today that by August the last man of the American Expeditionary forces will have been withdrawn from France. He said this estimate was based on the movement of 300,000 men a month to the United States.

Already, Mr. Baker said, the American forces in France have been divorced from the army of occupation. Plans have been completed to supply the force in Germany through the ports of Antwerp and Rotterdam, removing the necessity for maintaining the 700 mile line of communication from Brest. The French ports will be maintained, however, for the withdrawal of the A. E. F.

More than half of the expeditionary forces has now left France, Mr. Baker said.

Airplanes to Fly Straight Through.

Eugene, Or., May 8.—On request of Lieutenant Colonel Henry L. Watson, commander of Mather Field at Sacramento, the airplane committee of the Eugene chamber of commerce will send him a sketch of the landing field on the west side of the city. In his letter, Colonel Watson announces that the airplanes flying from Sacramento to Portland during the Rose Festival will stop here on the return trip for exhibition flights. The planes will fly straight through on the trip northward. Lieutenant Hogland, who flew north to Seattle from Sacramento last summer, alighted here. He declared that the Eugene landing grounds were the best between this city and Mather field.

A COAT OF ARMS

By GENEVIEVE ULMAR.

"Thank goodness, that is over!" With lofty disdain Mrs. Drury tilted her small pug nose in the air and settled herself comfortably in the Pullman coach as the Overland express started away from Lone Cliff.

The cause of her perturbation had been the fact that her husband, sturdy, commonplace and loyal to a fault, was out on the rear platform of the car waving adieu to a cheering, demonstrative group of his fellow citizens. They were representative of a mining town, red-shirted, unshaven men, filled with enthusiasm and firewater and thoroughly sincere in their genuine good-wishes for a man who had stood by them and for them through ten years. They had proved their friendship by electing him mayor of the town only a month previous and a real tear stood in the eye of John Drury as the friends and town faded from view.

His pretty daughter, Mabel, had not been too proud or exclusive to stand beside him, and he was pleased because of her sharing his truly democratic spirit. Many a courteous, though vehement compliment greeted the little lady from the crowd. She had eyes, however, mainly for a young fellow who lingered on its outskirts, Norman Roode, and the last parting wave of her dainty handkerchief was in his direction.

"Now we're going to catch it!" she laughed, as they entered the coach and joined her mother, prim and censorious.

"A nice spectacle you make of yourself, hobnobbing with that common herd," scolded Mrs. Drury. "I hope you forget them speedily. And dragging Mabel into it!"

"See, here, Nancy—" began John.

"That is not my name!" snapped his better half.

"I forgot you've changed it to Anastasia. All right, if it suits you. Only you've changed other things and I'm right downhearted because of it. Tell you, girl, you're tearing me away from all I cherish—the free mountains, the rough-and-ready life, friends who are true as steel. I wish I'd never struck the Golden Chance!"

"You are an ungrateful man," stormed Mrs. Drury. "It isn't every man that a goldmine comes to. You are no longer John Drury, half fellow well met with a crowd of illiterate prospectors, but the Hon. John Drury, esquire, millionaire. I should think you'd be glad to see me and Mabel with a chance to shine in society and lift up our heads with the best of them."

John Drury did not reply. He uttered a sigh, and Mabel echoed it. She was thinking of the handsome, manly young mine manager to whom she had been all but engaged, of the glad, free life of the hills, of the home, the best in Lone Cliff, a liberty hall for all the young people in the district.

The lucky strike of John Drury had been the marvel of the year in mining circles. A chance discovery had made him a rich man over night. He had asked nothing better than to work the opulent claim and share his good luck with old and tried comrades, but the possession of riches had aroused in his wife the loftiest ambitions. Meekly submissive, John made only a feeble protest.

"Maybe she'll come to her senses when she sees the hollowness of her great ideas of society," hoped honest, home-loving John.

The experience of the Drurys, led by the determined spirit of its guiding genius, underwent a truly newly-rich experience. First, they took an expensive suite in the most exclusive of New York hotels; then a house of a sumptuous bonapart mansion. A professional chaperone pretended to introduce Mrs. Drury among the high circles of fashion. There was a young man who claimed to be an expatriated Italian count. Then Mrs. Drury became envious of the coat of arms exploited by a neighbor. She ordered one for herself. It was blazoned on the family silverware, it glowed on the elegant family automobile. Mabel thought of running away when the illustrious count found favor in the eyes of her mother as a prospective son-in-law.

Then, slowly but surely, Mrs. Drury began to learn that her guests were of the parvenu class. They feasted royally at her expense. They borrowed money of her husband. One day the crisis came. The specialist who had sought out the coat of arms was a conscientious man. He appeared, flustered and penitent, one day.

"Madame," he said, "I have made a fearful mistake. In tracing back the Drury genealogy an assistant mistook Phineas for Philetus. The Phineas branch of the family were humble colliery workers. I will return the money you paid me—"

"No, no, go forget it! I am sick of all this show and folly!" moaned the humbled "Anastasia."

The count learned of the episode and declared he could not connect himself with the rabble! A local newspaper wrote up the situation, though using fictitious names. Mrs. Drury came to where her husband and Mabel were seated reading one day and burst into tears.

"Take me back home," she pleaded. "I would rather be mayoress in Lone Cliff than a nobody in New York."

And John lifted his head with a snort of delight, as if already sniffling again the pure, bracing air of the mining camp.

And Mabel thought of Norman

Faint Praise.

Speaking of doubtful compliments, a subscriber writes: "I wish to offer the following as one of the best examples I have ever seen. An accomplished musician was invited by a friend to a church service in order to hear the chorus choir render a special selection. The friend, highly pleased with the rendition, was awaiting with much interest her companion's verdict. It came thus, in a whisper: "They did well."—From the Outlook.
