Stanley's Subterfuge.

Possessing an ample purse of her own, also a Puritan conscience, Stanley's mother discourages the acceptance by him of gratuities from adult friends. How he evaded the spirit if not the letter of the law is told by William H. Dimock.

"Sure, I knew the kid's ma doesn't like folks to slip money to him, but I also know—thanks to a good memory—the sweet sense of peace and prosperity a nickel yields to a boy," he says.

"I almost stepped on the youngster while steering for a 10 a. m. breakfast and shot him to the little place on the corner for the latest peace congress headlines. When he returned with the paper I noticed his little hand looked awfully empty; also it had not been withdrawn. So I slipped a coin into it.

"Stanley's mother later reminded him he had been admonished never, never to ask for money for any little service rendered.

"'But I didn't, mother,' answered that valiant little George Washington. 'I just held out my hand.'"—Brockton Enterprise

ANOTHER VICTORY

By MARGARET HOLMES

"That's a yellower perch, Sally, that one is." The old man, Sal'y's grandfather, dropped a squirming fish into the boat, stuck a stubby forefinger into a tomato can at his feet, scooped up a long, wriggling worm and proceeded to drape it upon the fish hook.

It was a June evening, between sunset and dusk. The girl sitting beside the aged man in the boat looked troubled. For a few moments she watched the yellow perch flopping about at her feet, then gingerly she lifted it and slipped it back into the water.

"Why do water lilies close their petals when the sun goes down, grandfather?" she asked.

The old man, fumbling with the bait and hook, ignored her question.

"A dead worm ain't much temptation to fish," he soliloquized; "always put the bait on so it covers the hook, an' always leave a bit of the worm wriggling at the ends."

He cast the line again, and the girl watched it as it went quivering out toward the shining green leaves of the lily pads.

"That's all he thinks about," she thought, "that and the price of lumber."

"The trouble with grandfather is," she reflected, "that he has a pile of money and he doesn't know how to spend it, and people call him the 'Lumber King,' and he thinks that he is some kind of a monarch who knows it all, and, really, he doesn't know hardly anything. I guess he has a lot to learn about—about some things."

A bunch of limp water lilies lay in the girl's lap, and she lifted them to her face.

"He forgets," she confided to the lilies, "that I am 20. He thinks that because I am all he has, and because, some day, I'll be very rich, and because that away back in '49 he and Ned's grandfather had a quarrel—he thinks because of all that—that Ned—Ned Burrett—is not good enough for me. He won't allow me to see Ned; he opens every letter that comes into the house, and ever since Ned returned from France, a week ago, grandfather doesn't let me out of his sight. He just hates the Burretts, and the fact that the Burretts are the very nicest people, and that Ned has covered himself and his family with glory and has come home decorated—decorated with ever so many medals—that fact impresses my grandfather not at all. He simply—"

Her eyes had caught a swirl on the water, a whip of the tautened line as it swung upward, and then, high up in the air, another sight caught and held the young rebellious eyes. It was the sight of a huge flying thing.

"Look, look, grandfather, look at the airplane!"

The fish upon the line was forgotten. The wary old eyes of Sam Densmore were beholding a new, strange thing.

The big plane had begun to swoop lower, lower it came, droning like a million bees.

"Looks as if it was comin' down in my meadow," the old man looked perplexed. "You go up to the house, Sally an'—an' I'll go an' see."

With a few strokes Sam Densmore benched the boat and scrambled out. Through a tangle of cedar and swamp-oak he took a short cut to the meadow.

Sally, her eyes shining now, tripped along toward the house. Now and then she laughed and kissed the lilies in her hand. From the veranda she watched the two men standing in the meadow below.

For a long time she watched them, her heart pounding and a prayer upon her lips. Then, when it was almost dark, she saw them climb the hill together, and she went out to meet them, for she knew that a gallant young officer had won another victory.

Chinese Trees Like Ours.

Separated by 8,000 miles of ocean and 4,000 miles of land, the eastern part of North America and the forest areas of China present some striking resemblances in vegetation. According to the Journal of Heredity, three species of forest trees that grow wild in both China and the United States, but nowhere else, are particularly noteworthy. They are the tulip poplar (Liriodendron sp.), the sassafras (Sassafras sp.) and the hickory (Carya sp.). It has been decided by geologists that China and America were at one time united by land. Hence the trees just mentioned probably grew continuously from China to the eastern United States, with differences between different localities no greater than those now to be found between various parts of the United States. When the land connection was severed conditions were such that the trees became centered in the eastern part of this country and in parts of China where the climatic conditions were similar. The growth was henceforth discontinuous, broken by the Pacific ocean and the arid plains of the far West. Under such conditions, the Chinese and American species, although far apart, have remained virtually identical through hundreds of generations.—Youth's Companion.

Teach by Example.

It is easier to show other people their duty than to do our own. Moreover, there are many ready to reach who are not willing to practice. Exhortations are more plentiful than examples, but they are never so powerful.

Cotton Gears.

Cotton which has been put under hydraulic pressure of from 6,000 to 8,000 pounds and made into gears, produces an article superior to that made of steel. Softer than steel, the cotton gear yields where the steel would wear under friction.
