FISH FOR GULLS AND PETRELS.

These Birds, as Well as the Albatross, Are Frequently Taken With Rod and Line.

Curious though it may seem, it is a fact that birds are caught with rod and line in many parts of the world. The pastime is declared to be almost as fascinating as fishing. Gulls in Newfoundland are caught in this way in large quantities. In New England fishing for gulls and petrels is an important industry.

The method of bird fishing is practically the same as that of ordinary fishing. Two men go out in a dory and throw pieces of cod liver on the water. When large quantities of birds have been attracted to the spot more cod liver is thrown out on a hook. This the birds greedily swallow and thus fall easy victims.

Albatross are fished for in the same way off the Cape of Good Hope. A piece of pork is attached to a long line and thrown overboard. The bird will eye it for a long time, gradually and cautiously making toward it. Suddenly he will seize it and hold it in his beak. When he discovers that he is caught he will sit on the water and vigorously flap his wings. However, he will be drawn into the boat and made a captive.

Albatross fishing is good sport, since the bird requires careful handling. So long as he pulls against the line it is easy enough. The moment, however, he swims forward the hook will drop from his beak unless it is skillfully manipulated, and the bird will find himself free.

Early Progress of Industry. Prior to 1885 the progress made in the development of the automobile can be summed up as follows: In general style the body was a park phaeton, a ponderous complicated contrivance, which would crush the passengers as it passed over them. The gasoline was stored in a large tank in front. The motor and controlling apparatus were placed beneath the bed of the vehicle. Excessive weight and complicated machinery helped in a great measure to make it an utter failure. One week after another automobile was got out of order. The result of the explosion of the gasoline was suggestive of a railroad locomotive.—Chevrolet Bulletin.

Young Doctor Millard was a severe man. But while his patients stood in awe of him, still he enjoyed their confidence. This may have been particularly due to the fact the mantle of the father had fallen upon his son's shoulders.

Old Doctor Millard had long been a power in the township. But whatever hope old Doctor Millard's friends had of continuing their friendship with his son, the hope was shattered by Doctor Harry's aloofness as he took up the work which his father was forced to lay aside.

The town's one millionaire, a gruff factory owner, had succumbed to his reputation for skill. John Storm needed a doctor and he called Harry Millard; but it was a case of steel meeting steel; in no phase of treatment could physician and patient agree.

Doctor Millard knowing that to operate would be the only sure way, decidedly ordered an operation—which John Storm as determinedly refused.

The ambition of Doctor Millard was limitless, and he yearned for more than an inherited name in his profession. The old doctor had not been known as a surgeon, and while Harry's dreams led him victoriously onward, a former hater hid.

"How do, Doc," he called, "goin' to have help in the village I hear?" "Help?" Harry queried.

The man nodded.

"Don't mean to say you ain't heered of the new doctor that's taken the Pills' place? I carted the office furniture out yesterday; all sorts of electric flin's too, seems pretty sure of making a go here. Reckon they's room for two of you though."

He frowningly continued his way, when a girl signalled to him farther down the dusty road. Harry bowed with his usual dignity, when something strangely appealing in the wide violet eye, and upraised face, caused his firm mouth to curve in a reassuring smile.

"You beckoned me?" she asked.

"Yes, thank you," the girl replied, her tone also had a diffident, musical quality.

"I am a stranger, and I wonder if it would be asking a great deal—"

"Yes?" he encouraged.

"To ask you—" the girl repeated, "to let me ride with you up the hill?"

Instantly Doctor Harry alighted, assisting her in unaccustomed chivalry to the seat beside him.

"I am on my way to John Storm's residence," she explained, "perhaps you may be able to direct me."

"I will take you there," the doctor quickly agreed; across his mind flashed the thought that here might be a valuable ally.

"You are going to visit the Storms?" "For the night only," the girl replied. "I have to go to the city in the morning."

"You have doubtless heard," the doctor continued, "of Mr. Storm's critical condition. I am his physician."

"I have heard," the girl answered quietly, "also that his physician demands an operation which Mr. Storm refused."

"He can't refuse it much longer," said Dr. Millard.

"As serious as that?" the girl questioned sympathetically.

He nodded.

"John Storm is obstinate willed is he not?" she asked, "when compulsion failed, did you try—perfusion?"

"I'm not adept at that sort of thing," the doctor grimly admitted.

Suddenly the girl smiled at him. She stood before the entrance of the great house, and looked back and smiled again.

"I am," she said briefly, and passed inside the door.

The doctor was strangely haunted by that elfish smile, by the memory of soft violet eyes.

"An unusual girl," he muttered—"a really wonderful girl!"

Certain annoying events which followed failed to obliterate her pleasing memory. He was awakened to the fact that this new doctor was stealing his desirable patients.

"The children are not afraid of Doctor Gilmore," parents excused. Then came the crushing blow. John Storm had agreed to the very operation which he himself had ordered—but at the suggestion of the new invincible Doctor Gilmore.

When Doctor Harry sat bitterly viewing the wreckage of his promising career, a girl's figure appeared in his office doorway—the figure of the girl of his haunting dreams.

"You remember me?" she began softly.

"No, thank you, I can't sit down; I am in a hurry and shall need you—with me. You may recall our conversation concerning Mr. Storm? Well, he has decided to follow your advice concerning the operation."

"Mine?" Harry burst out, "I understood that it was Doctor Gilmore who had persuaded him."

"It was." Again the girl smiled into his perplexed face. "I told you that I was good at persuading. I am Doctor Gilmore! But when it comes to real work—"

Impulsively she held out her hands. "You are the one to do that," she said. Her eyes besought him.

"I know that we are going to do great work together," said small Doctor Gilmore.

And Harry, while clasping the proffered hands, smiled his new and ra-
