Notice of Sheriff's Sale.

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE STATE OF OREGON, IN AND FOR JACKSON COUNTY.
Austin O'Grady,

Plaintiff,
vs.
Giles A. Olin,

Defendant.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of a judgment and decree duly given, dated, entered and docketed in the above entitled court and cause on February 15, 1919, wherein the above named plaintiff recovered judgment against the above named defendant for the sum of $849.50 with 10% interest thereon from Feb. 15, 1919, and the further sum of $87.25 with 6% interest thereon from Dec. 5, 1918, and the further sum of $75.00 attorney's fees, and the further sum of $18.40 costs, with 10% interest thereon from February 15, 1919; and wherein it is decreed that the mortgage described in plaintiff's complaint therein is a first lien upon the herein-after described property and that the same be sold as upon execution for the satisfaction of the aforesaid judgment and accruing costs.

Now, therefore, pursuant to said judgment and decree and by virtue of an execution dated September 20, 1919, issued pursuant thereto by the clerk of and under the seal of the above entitled court, on October 28, 1919, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M., at the front door of the court house at Jacksonville, Jackson County, Oregon, I will sell at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, subject to redemption as by law provided, the following described property and all estate and interest that said Giles A. Olin had therein on December 18, 1914, or that he has since acquired or now has therein, to-wit: the Northwest Quarter of Section 10, Township 34, South of Range 2 West of the Willamette Meridian in Jackson County, State of Oregon.

Dated this 20th day of September, 1919.

A WOMAN'S TOUCH

By JACK LAWTON.

(Copyright, 1919, Western Newspaper Union) Delight gazed across the far-reaching fields as she leaned against the old fence that bordered the roadway. She was reviewing a little sadly the events of a fast changing year, when misfortune had followed misfortune until she had been obliged to close her own home and disperse with the companionship of the old nurse who had in her loneliness become her friend. Then Delight, in quest of necessary employment, had answered a strange advertisement.

There were so few things that her home life had fitted her to do the unusual advertisement seemed to have been especially written for herself. Duncan Reynolds of "The Towers" required the services of a young woman who could give to his great abode the home atmosphere.

"I've servants enough," he said, "and a good housekeeper, but the place is like an institution. I want—" Delight fancied that the shrewd eyes softened—"I want a woman's touch, the right kind of flowers on the table, the sound of a piano at night maybe—I'm glad that you have applied for the position."

With her arms folded now on the fence rail Delight marvelled that she had become an inmate and a necessary inmate of the great mansion on which she had looked with awe since the days of her childhood.

The erratic old gentleman who was its occupant and owner had been regarded as a sort of ogre then.

The old nurse had told to Delight weird tales of the great house on the hill—how, long ago, maidens had feared the wealthy and handsome young Duncan as a sultan, because of his uncontrollable temper; and how at last he had gone upon a long visit, returning with a beautiful, gentle bride, who had lived but a few years like a prisoner behind the great house bars.

Delight, looking up to the center window of the tower, thought now of the gentle lady her nurse had described, and wondered if it was this woman's touch which the lonely man had missed throughout these years. Last night Duncan Reynolds had searched her face with questioning eyes.

"Why didn't you marry?" he asked with his usual brusqueness.

"Why," Delight had stammered, "I really don't know."

"You will make some man happy," he had said, and his rare smile eased the lines of tiredness from his face; "do not miss your opportunity when it comes. My life has been one of disappointment. First I lost my wife, whom I have never ceased to love. Then the little girl. My daughter would have been about your age."

"Oh! I did not know," Delight sympathized, "that you had lost a daughter."

"—and a son," the old man added sharply.

And as she stood reviewing her year with its unexpected paths, she yearned to restore to him in his loneliness the joy he had known and lost. And she wondered a little wistfully if the happiness he spoke of would ever be her own.

Then suddenly Delight was roused from her musings. A horse, tearing down the twisting road, reared wildly and tossed from its saddle a man who lay stunned for a moment—at her feet. Instantly she had slipped under the bars and was lifting the injured man's head, when his eyes opened, looking up at her.

"Nothing seems to hurt but my ankle," the young man said at last. "If you can hear my weight on your shoulder I'll try to stand up and see how bad that is."

"Pretty bad," he gasped, white-lipped after the effort.

"You had better rest back on the ground," Delight suggested, while I run over to The Towers and send a groom to help you."

"The Towers!" the young man exclaimed, "what are you doing there?" His suffering was so evident that she ignored the rudeness and answered his question.

"I am sure they will look after you over at The Towers," she added kindly, "if you will let me go for help."

"Is the great master there as savage as ever?" the young man asked.

"Mr. Reynolds is not savage at all," Delight indignantly retorted; "he is a lonely old man who has acquired understanding through sorrow."

She told Duncan Reynolds of their enforced guest that evening.

"They have put him in the blue room," she said; "the doctors said his injury would not permit him to be moved further."

Impatiently her employer turned to descend the stairs. Long after she heard him calling to her from the hall; Delight wondered, as she responded, at the change in the old man's face. Its grim lines seemed all at once to have changed to tenderness.

"The young man up there," he said slowly, "is my son; we quarreled years ago, and the boy ran away. That is how I lost him. He has been afraid to come back. Something you said to-day changed his mind. I thank you. For all the kindness of your woman's touch I cannot thank you. Perhaps happiness may be on its way as your reward, even as my happiness comes today."

"My boy wants to see you," Duncan Reynolds said. "Will you go up to him?"

And smiling back into the father's face Delight ran up the stairs.

A SHOPPING SPREE

By LYDIA L. ROBERTS.

(Copyright, 1919, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

Mrs. Barton shut the front door with a satisfied bang and hurried down the steps. Her next door neighbor tapped on the window and came to the door. "Are you going shopping, Anna?" she asked. "Lucky woman! I want to go, but I haven't any money. If only prices weren't so high. I just love to go on a shopping spree, but I can't this week."

"Come with me today, Alice," laughed Mrs. Barton. "Have you thirty cents you can spare?"

"Yes, of course, I have that much, but—"

"Come along quick, then, for that's my spending money today. I admit I'm going on a shopping spree, but remember this is not before the war but after; a sort of a post-war, moneyless spree! I'm off for three hours, while mother takes care of the children. I need a rest and a change and some variety."

"Going to get it for thirty cents?" teased Alice.

"Yes, indeed, and so are you; but you must do exactly as I say."

When they left the train and got on the boat Alice Brown started to go inside.

"Come out," insisted Anna. "Remember, we are out to get some air."

Alice hurried for the car after they got off the boat, but her friend smilingly pulled her coat. "We're house-bound home makers, my dear, out for exercise and air, and we get it by walking and saving our carfare."

"Our first stop on this tour," chanted Anna as they reached the shopping district, "is before the window of this big grocery store. Isn't it a picture!"

"I do wish our grocers would take hints from these artistic fruits in here and make their windows pretty and sunny," said Alice.

"We will now turn into one of the little narrow streets that holds great treasures in small spaces," continued Anna. "Here is a store full of exquisite butterfly art. Talk about colors! Look at the shimmering lights on that one butterfly wing!"

"Press your nose close to this big window pane and gaze at the wonderful paintings," commanded Anna as they walked on.

"The next store gives you the latest news in books."

"Oh, bless 'em, see the puppies!" cried Alice at the next window. "Five little curly haired puppies, all white, too, and a box full of bunnies and some dear little white kittens. I must bring the children in to see these cute, frolicsome animals and I'll make up bedtime stories about them."

"Come," said Anna, "there's another street near here where we can see weaving done and the beautiful arts and crafts work and a big florist shop."

As they came to the flower store Alice stopped.

"Anna, dear, that one window alone is worth coming to see!" she exclaimed.

Anna nodded and they stood silent before the loveliness of the massed calla lilies in deep blue bowls and jars standing in the dull green and delicate yellow background of other plants.

"The most beautiful lily in the world," said Anna, "and I never saw enough of them before."

"White calla lilies in a quaint blue bowl."

Bring joy to the eyes and peace to the soul."

With sighs of satisfaction finally the friends turned away.

"I hate to bring you down from the heights of poetry and lilies, dear," said Alice, "but I've just remembered that I need some closet hooks."

"I'm down on the ground again. Well, my practical friend, you may spend just ten cents and get your old hooks," laughed Anna.

As they came out of the store Anna met a friend and they stood talking a few minutes.

"I've been buying postcards," the newcomer said. "I buy them wholesale and sell retail to the girls in the office and put the profits in our sickness fund. Then if a girl is out sick we use the money for flowers or fruit for her."

"Let me see them," said Anna. "I need a few now and I can spend just one dime. Because," she explained, "we are out shopping with our eyes, buying goods that cost nothing."

"I have six cents left, besides my carfare home," said Alice as they walked along.

"Yes, we will spend that right here," replied Anna, stopping before a tiny store. "We are a little tired from walking, so much and need a nice cup of coffee and cream. Sit down in comfort and refreshments will now be served."

When they were rested Anna said, "Now it is time to get our train. The children will be coming home from school and we must be back on our jobs again."

"I've had a lovely time, dear," earnestly said Alice. "I never dreamed I would get so much enjoyment for thirty cents. Fourteen cents for carfare, ten cents for our purchases and six cents for refreshments is some spree!"

"Before the war," answered Anna, "a shopping spree meant candy, flowers, expensive lunch, things we might use, etc. But now we cheerfully get our air and lilies and exercise for thirty cents and give the rest to Uncle Sam for bonds and Thrift stamps and the Red Cross."

MARY HAD NOT FORGOTTEN

Movie Actress Tells Why She Long Has Had Grudge Against Robert Hilliard.

Robert Hilliard, actor, and best-dressed man in New York theatrical circles, was introduced to Mary Pickford recently. As they shook hands he smiled and said:

"My dear Miss Pickford, I have wanted to meet you for a long time. This is a pleasure, I assure you."

"Thank you, Mr. Hilliard," replied the movie actress, "but I must say your memory for faces isn't very good."

"Why?" he asked.

"Some twenty years ago, when you were playing in 'The Littlest Girl' in Toronto, you needed a child to be the girl. My mother offered my services. I was little Gladys Smith then. You looked me over and told me to go home and wash my hands."

"No, no!" replied the horrified Hilliard. "I couldn't have said that."

"But you did," persisted Miss Pickford; "but I told you my hands weren't dirty—they were chapped. You finally gave me the job, but I took a dislike to you just the same."

"You did! Why?"

"Because," concluded Miss Pickford, "you made me go home and wash my hands, anyway, and I detested soap and water in those days."

"Well, I declare!" said Mr. Hilliard, as he arranged his boutonniere.—Rehoboth Herald.

Explained.

She was weeping bitter tears into her afternoon tea. "Oh, my dear!" she said to her only friend, "I don't know what I shall do. Ted and I have only been married six months, yet he spends every evening at his club."

"Well, don't worry, darling," said the other. "Percy's just the same. But I shall never scold him again for spending so much time at his club."

"Why not?"

"Well, last night a burglar got into the house and my husband knocked him senseless with a poker. I've heard several men speak of him as a poker expert. He has evidently been practicing at the club for just such an emergency."—Exchange.
