WATER

Few people realize how essential water is to the body and only drink water when their fancy of thirst dictates. Water to the human body is as oil to machinery. Unless a machine is well oiled the bearings will wear. The amount of water necessary for the human body per day is approximately two quarts or eight glasses. Seventy-five per cent of the human body is water.

Water should not be iced, but for the pleasure of drink may be cold, and it goes without saying that all drinking water should be free from contamination.

TONGUE

The tongue is a muscle located inside the face and fastened at one end. The front end is the loose one. In some individuals it is looser than in others.

The tongue is used to crush food, to moisten a handkerchief when it is necessary to wash a child's face in public, to move gum from one side to the other, to keep the upper plate in position, to make business for divorce courts and to elect candidates.

If a boy has a silver tongue he grows up to be an orator and devotes his life to pointing out the duty of other people. Silver tongues are no longer in great demand, except in districts where men sleep in their underwear.

Sharp tongues are peculiar to the female of the species. In Puritan days the possessor of a sharp tongue was called a common scold and was ducked in a pond. Now, however, tongues of this type are no longer monopolized by the feminine sex, and males who possess them are called reformers and young intellectuals. If they are reformers they cuss everybody who disagrees with them, and if they are young intellectuals they cuss America.

When the loose end of a tongue is not working it rests against the roof of the mouth. In New England the tongue occupies this position the greater part of the time, but even a New England tongue will leave its parking place and rattle with great enthusiasm when the owner surrounds about three fingers of patent medicine. Attending a meeting of the sewing circle has a similar effect.

Ox tongue is a delicacy greatly enjoyed by some individuals. It is not expensive, and if eaten with oxtail soup it enables one to make ends meet.—Baltimore Sun.

CALVIN COOLIDGE, JR.

Calvin Coolidge, Jr., died at 10 o'clock Monday night at Walter Reed army hospital, Washington, where the boy had been taken when it was realized that his illness was serious. Blood poisoning was the cause of his death and resulted from infection of a small blister which he acquired playing tennis. Blood transfusion was resorted to as a last possible relief, but without avail. The boy was sixteen years of age.

The president and Mrs. Coolidge were at the bedside of the lad when the end came.
