Bucking the system

A team of health care workers has splintered from OHSU and founded its own clinic on a daring proposition

by Inga Sorensen

Nestled in a lushly green Southwest Portland neighborhood, surrounded by gardens planted by physicians, nurse practitioners, nurses and support staff alike, sits the freshly opened Fanno Creek Clinic.

On paper, the facility is lifelessly dubbed a primary care medical practice; in real life, however, Fanno Creek may better be viewed as a refreshing approach to providing health care.

"We are very excited about this," says Dr. Gregg Coodley, 38, the former chief of the internal medicine division at Oregon Health Sciences University, the sprawling public corporation leaning over downtown Portland.

Coodley, who has worked very closely with patients living with HIV/AIDS, is part of a group of nearly 20 former OHSU faculty, nurses and staff who defected from Pill Hill, pooled their
