ADVICE

Freaks and geeks

Pomposity—it's the eighth deadly sin

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I have a new friend I'll call Pamela. I've gotten to know her through a book group and was thrilled to find a new sane friend. She is smart, fun and easy to talk to; she's exactly the kind of friend I've wanted.

The problem is that she has a very possessive girlfriend, Trudy, who makes jealous comments and seems threatened by Pamela's friendships with other women. Trudy also intercepts her phone messages. I've called a few times to offer Pamela a ride to the book group or to invite the two of them to dinner, and Trudy is invariably the one who returns my calls. She chats with me and says Pamela is out or busy. But then when I see Pamela, she doesn't seem to know I've called.

I don't think this strange behavior is specific to me; other mutual friends have commented on it. I've considered mentioning it to Pamela—this is a relatively new relationship for her, so I'm not sure she knows—but I'm not sure if bringing it up would harm our fledgling friendship. What do you think?

—Freaked Out by the Girlfriend

DEAR FREAKED OUT BY THE GIRLFRIEND:

If Pamela hasn't realized that Trudy is a possessive freak, she's sure to notice it soon. The line between noticing someone's jealous behavior and feeling like it's unbearably oppressive can sometimes be very thin. Then the urge to pack one's car and head for the highway comes on like a case of Montezuma's revenge. If you hope for a close friendship with Pamela, it's probably better if you're not the first to mention Trudy's behavior. Pamela may mistakenly perceive your intentions as divisive, particularly if her relationship with Trudy is already shaky. And Pamela will more likely confide about relationship troubles that arise if she doesn't also have to sort out her feelings about you having brought Trudy's possessiveness to her attention. Unfounded jealousy is deadly to a relationship because it makes at least one party feel constrained about participating in life's pleasures (like having a new book group or new friendships). Eventually, if their relationship is going to survive, Pamela is going to have to tell Trudy to bug off, one way or another. So, if you hang in there at a patient distance, you'll probably ultimately be able to have a closer friendship with her.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR: "Confused" recently asked you about the proper way to address correspondence to gay couples, inquiring whether one or both surnames should be used. I was disheartened to see that your reply focused on the merits of surname hyphenation rather than proper forms of address and gave no consideration to which name should precede the other. The example you offered, of "stacked" names sans courtesy titles, showed all the thoughtful consideration of a spreadsheet program.

I hasten to offer the correct etiquette for both matters, which circumvents that entire surname hyphenation business entirely. When addressing two gentlemen who consider themselves coupled, their names should be preceded with the courtesy title of "Messrs.," which is the abbreviation of the French word "Messieurs," which roughly translates as "Misters."

Similarly, two ladies who consider themselves coupled are properly addressed with the courtesy title of "Mme.," the abbreviation of the French word "Mesdames," which of course translates as "Madams" (without the nefarious English connotation).

In both instances, an ampersand conjoins the partners' names. To wit:

Messrs. John Smith & Jack Jones
Mme. Jane Smith & Jacqueline Jones

As for which name should precede the other, I have found the following rule of thumb to be convenient and agreeable. If I made the acquaintance of one person before he or she met the future partner, that name precedes. If I met the couple after they were already partnered, the name of the elder precedes.

I hope you find this information useful.

—Monsieur Manners

DEAR MONSIEUR MANNERS:

You are a pompous etiquette nightmare. Ms. Behavior actually said that hyphenation should only be inflicted on people who have made that choice and should only be considered by couples whose names sound good together. Also, what sort of pretentiousness would inspire you to use a French word as a title on an American envelope?

Ms. Behavior did respond to the question of which name should precede the other and still believes her rule of including the sexual top's name first is superior; your notion of using the elder person's name first is sure to irritate more than a few sensitive homosexuals. Merci, mon petit turd. ☹
