When your Internet girlfriend isn't what you envisioned

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:
I met a woman I'll call Adrienne through an online personal ad and really like her. She finally scanned her photo and sent it to me and, much to my dismay, I don't find her at all attractive.

I am so bummed out. Adrienne is not "ugly," but she's really not my type. I don't think of myself as shallow, but I do believe chemistry is a necessary ingredient in a relationship.

I'd love to meet her and be friends, but I'm not thinking about kissing her anymore. Should I tell her now that I'm not romantically interested anymore? I'm afraid it will be obvious that it's because I saw her photograph, and I don't want to be hurtful.

My friends tell me that I shouldn't meet her to try to be friends because we all have enough friends, and I shouldn't waste her time or mine. But Adrienne is way more interesting than they are. What should I do?

Ms. Behavior
by Meryl Cohn

breakfast with friends, we were talking about ex-lovers who are now "straight."

Greg mentioned that his old handsome boyfriend Nathan (who is now married to a woman but still fools around with men) lives in the town we're moving to. I became so anxious that I drank four cosmopolitans!

Greg said that my feeling worried is ridiculous and that he has no interest in Nathan. But Nathan was Greg's most significant boyfriend until I came along, and Greg happened to mention in the past that he and Nathan had "amazing sex."

During the entire year of planning our move, why do you suppose Greg neglected to mention that we're moving to Nathan's hometown? I'm not sure I want to move anymore. Am I really just being "ridiculous"?

—Don't Want to Play the Fool

DEAR DON'T WANT TO PLAY THE FOOL:

Are you anxious because you think Greg plans to meet Nathan for a drink, talk about old times, unzip Nathan's pants and remind him of why he used to be gay? Have you asked Greg directly about whether he plans to even see him? Talking about it for a while should give you some sense of Greg's intentions or at least how honest he's prepared to be.

You haven't said what city you're moving to, but hopefully it will be big enough for the three of you. You and Greg need to talk about how each one of you feels about monogamy, which will help you to assess whether your feelings of insecurity are based in reality or in your own neurotic little mind.

Either way, you can't protect against infidelity by staying where you live now. Your boyfriend, if he wanted to, could have sex with someone else in your hometown or even on your chenille sofa while you're out buying a bagel and a newspaper. ☐

DEAR EMILY THE TERRIBLE:

You may need a few new friends to supplement the apparently dull ones you have now, and Adrienne might be a good bet. But what's your rush in rejecting her as a prospective date?

She finally scanned her photo and sent it to me and, much to my dismay, I don't find her at all attractive

There's nothing wrong with waiting until you meet in person to conclude that someone is not your type. Chemistry is a beautiful thing, but it arises from more than just a flat image. It depends on things like touch and mannerisms and pheromones and even on huskiness of voice and lushness of smell, which is way more sensory information than you can get in the form of a photograph.

If you like someone's personality and sense of humor and way of being in the world but they're not your type, yes, that's good grounds for sticking to nothing more or less than friendship.

But, occasionally, someone who doesn't appear to be your type will exude a scent that drives you wild, and friendship won't be enough for you. You'll have to have her. You can't make it happen and neither can she; it just has to be there. You'll know, because you won't be able to stop licking her neck.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

After a year of planning, my boyfriend, Greg, and I are moving together to a new city. Today during
