Where's Mr. Right?

As gay men, each of us wants to have a special person in our life. He should be handsome, fun, sensitive, caring and selfless. Our ideal man would be created solely for us. We would love him, but on our terms, and he wouldn't be needy or difficult. He would magically fade in and out based on our needs and would share the same taste in movies, food and hobbies. Of course, we'll never find such a mythical Mr. Right so we understand that we have to settle for less. But even a more lackluster candidate often proves elusive. Just when we think we've found him — Poof! He turns out to be another flake. We have to wonder why there are so few men capable of intimacy.

Time to pick up the mirror and take a good look at ourselves. The truth is that most of us are severely handicapped when it comes to intimacy. Sexual intimacy we understand but emotional and spiritual intimacy are foreign concepts. As soon as the infatuation fades we struggle to stick it out or simply leave altogether. Many of us are so afraid of the potential pain of intimacy that we never risk allowing our emotions to genuinely surface. We choose to be numb rather than be hurt.

But we are created for intimacy. The 139th Psalm in the Bible beautifully describes our closeness to God, a relationship modeled by Jesus in his life on earth. Until we find our lives in God, we will be alienated, not only from others, but from our own selves. Perhaps we should give up the search for Mr. Right until we are caught up in the love that exceeds all other loves. Then we will be free to love unconditionally.
