ADVICE

Getting Googled

How much do you want to know?

Ms. Behavior
by Meryl Cohn

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I recently returned to the dating scene after ending a 10-year monogamous relationship. I am meeting most guys over the Internet because I don't go to bars.

I had a date recently that reminded me how things have changed since the last time I was single. He mentioned that he had looked me up on the Internet and found an editorial I had broadcast over a local radio station. At first I was glad he mentioned it, because the material would make for good dinner conversation. As it turned out, he wasn't interested in discussing this at all.

Then I got to thinking, why the heck would he Google me? I can understand the need to screen dates through the local "most wanted" list, but more than that seems a little tacky.

What else do you need to know about a guy before meeting him? His credit rating? His employment history? His most recent address? You're certainly not going to use the Internet to see if I like long walks in the moonlight and cuddling during rainstorms.

What do you think about this? Should I be running these guys through a Google search before I meet them?

—Unhappily Googled

DEAR UNHAPPILY GOOGLED:

Ms. Behavior doesn't mean to frighten you, but people other than potential dates may also Google you and, in fact, are probably Googling the hell out of you right now.

Who else might do it? Business acquaintances, friends from school, anyone you happen to meet at a party and old boyfriends who need to know whether you're as successful as they are. In fact, Ms. Behavior plans to Google you as soon as she finishes her column.

Perhaps your 10 recent years of monogamy took you and your mate to a sweet and gentle place, far removed from wireless networks, search engines and the curious minds that want to undress you before a first date. It's a quaint image, you and your boyfriend cuddling on the couch, ever spared from the rapid evolution of threatening technology, with no worries about what information might come up—or, worse, not come up—on a prospective date's 20-inch monitor.

Purists and Luddites may still want to cultivate and savor a first-date impression that hasn't been created or modified by the media. But they're roughly in the same proportion of the population as those who choose not to know the gender of their babies in advance, even though the technology is available.

Googling may at first seem somewhat rude, like looking in a neighbor's window while he undresses, but really it's not. Practically speaking, it's more like choosing not to cover your eyes while your neighbor walks naked through your front yard.

As for whether you should Google prospective dates before meeting them, of course you should! But be forewarned that it's as addictive as snack food and masturbation.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I'm dating a nice man whose company I enjoy. I'm not in love with Charlie, which he says is OK with him, but I worry that his feelings might be stronger than mine.

We see each other two or three times a week. We go to the movies or the opera, have dinner, have sex and spend the night together. Anytime things seem too heavy or romantic, I remind him that I'm not in love and not ready for anything serious. I'm still open to dating other people.

My friends tell me that no matter what I say, my actions are misleading and are likely to hurt Charlie. I don't think it's my job to protect him from hurt as long as I tell the truth about my feelings. What do you think?

—V.

DEAR V.:

The "I'm not in love with you" mantra only works if you can deliver it sincerely and consistently and if the other person is able to hear it. Only you know if you're being emotionally honest with your thrice-weekly date.

If your friends are concerned, it may be because they hear you saying the words, "I'm not in love with you," while your behavior spells out L-O-V-E, as clearly as if you were tapping it out on Charlie's back in Morse code.

Why would you (perhaps unconsciously) give mixed messages like that? Maybe you're lonely. Maybe the sex is good and readily available. And perhaps you want to have your cake and eat it, too (while keeping the option to spit it out).

If you continue to date Charlie, ask yourself what you'd be doing differently if you were in love with him. If you can't think of anything, you're probably misleading him. ☐
