Moment of Truth

Should I stay or should I go?

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I've been in a relationship with a woman for a year. We've had a quiet kind of relationship: no drama, no mad crazy love, just a good time.

When we first met, we agreed we'd let things happen naturally. Eventually, I fell for her and was speaking in terms of love and forever. She was slower to come around; a month ago she told me she loved me for the first time. We've been talking about moving in together next summer, and she's planning to spend Christmas with my family.

Her ex (who was her first love) called a week ago and is still in love with her. My mate waited a week to tell me. The entire week, she had an attitude with me and distanced herself, leaving me to feel like I had done something wrong. She said that she wasn't sure about moving in together, that she had some need for closure, that she wasn't really sure where her head was, etc. This happened once before, at around four months as well.

I told her I didn't want half of her and not to call me until she got her stuff together. She called the next morning, saying she had dealt with it and she wanted to be with me. OK, great. But now I don't trust her with my heart. I don't want to keep second-guessing her, but what if I spend another year with her and this happens again? I no longer trust anything she says. I want to stay with her and work this out and move forward, but I also don't want to be a fool. I don't know what to do, leave or stay.

—Untrusting Heart

DEAR UNTRUSTING HEART:

When you say you and your girlfriend haven't had "mad crazy love," do you think that's a good thing? Some people (Ms. Behavior included) live for mad crazy love, at least in the beginning. Mad crazy love by itself isn't a sturdy foundation for a long-term relationship (if you don't also have friendship and compatibility) but it does imply a certain amount of passion and sexual attraction that can help sustain you as a couple, even when you go through periods of Normal Marital Hatred. Have you considered the possibility that you and your girlfriend just aren't in love?

Either way, you're right to be wary, because it sounds like you and your girlfriend aren't grounded in the same reality. If she has unfinished business with her ex, it's not going to go away just because you want it to. You need to protect yourself until she sorts it out, which may take months. You could either break up for a while, or just shield your heart a bit until her intentions become clearer. Hopefully, she'll either move past her past, or you'll see that she can't do it and you'll choose to move on.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

My partner, Carlos, just received an invitation to a gay wedding with only his name on it. The people inviting him are his friends, not mine, but shouldn't they have included me? It's not like they don't know I exist. Strangely, Carlos expects me to go with him, despite the fact that I wasn't invited (and the invitation didn't even say "...and guest").

I'm not willing to go unless I'm clearly invited. Should my partner confront the bridegrooms-to-be? Or should I just not go, which would be OK with me, but not with Carlos? I don't even want to go, especially since it's a themed wedding with "red attire desired."

—Phil

DEAR PHIL:

Carlos should tell the bridegrooms that he's confused by the fact that the invitation didn't include you. This allows them the opportunity to fix the problem if it happens to be a mistake or an oversight. But if they respond in any other way, like, "We're only inviting friends, but not their boyfriends" or "Phil's face would ruin our wedding photos," then Carlos should decline, sparing you the obligation of buying a red tie or panties. 19
