Repressed and Depressed

What if I don't like going down on women?

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

This is embarrassing, but I am 43 and somewhat repressed and haven't fully discovered who I am. Several years ago, I had strong feelings for a woman, my friend Janis. Janis felt the same way, but we were afraid to do anything about it. I couldn't cope with the idea of labels or what it might mean to my kids. Janis eventually moved away with someone else. I regret that we never made love; it might have clarified a lot for me.

I find myself looking at both women and men, but I'm scared to pursue anything with a woman without knowing if I could actually go through with it. What if I went home with a woman and then realized in the middle that it was a mistake? To be perfectly blunt, what if I don't like going down on women? Or what if I could only do it if I loved the person? But if I loved her, wouldn't it hurt more if it didn't work out? Should I just pick someone up? Or should I just watch lesbian porn to get a better sense of whether it's for me?

—Getting Older by the Day

Ms. Behavior
BY MERYL COHN

DEAR GETTING OLDER BY THE DAY:

Forget the porn. With few rare exceptions, lesbian porn is made by men, for men, and bears no resemblance to lesbian sex. Big-haired women with long red fingernails lick each other's pussies like lizards eating flies. They wear high heels, fake their orgasms and usually just bide their time with a lesbian snack until the next big cock comes along. This won't help you assess whether lesbian sex appeals to you.

Lesbian books, on the other hand, might help. Go to a queer bookstore and browse. You'll find illustrated books about sexuality, books about sexual fantasies, erotic fiction and how-to books that get down to the nitty-gritty about sex. If you're as repressed as you say, you should probably also get to know your body better. Pretend it's the '70s and look at your vagina with a mirror. Touch yourself, taste yourself, and make your vagina your friend.

The one time you were unequivocal in your attraction for a woman was when you had strong emotional feelings for her. So, picking someone up and going down on her to check it out probably wouldn't tell you much. Nor should you serially sample a large variety of pussy to see if there's a flavor you particularly like. More likely, you should wait until you meet someone you actually like and desire. You don't have to be in love, but it sounds like your passion needs to arise from connection, not curiosity. Tell her it's your first time, and if she doesn't run away, maybe she'll like the idea of deflowering you.

Please bear in mind that Ms. Behavior's responses are individual. If you'd written something different, Ms. Behavior might have encouraged you to turn into a slut for the sake of self-discovery. But in your case, a more integrated experience is likely to be more revealing.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

Is it ever appropriate to send a present for a party or event that you weren't invited to? My new boyfriend's ex-boyfriend's new boyfriend is turning 35. My new boyfriend, Roger, was invited, but not me. I'd like to become a part of this close-knit group of friends, so I wanted to send a present with my boyfriend to the party. I thought it might be a good gesture, but my new boyfriend isn't so sure. He said it might appear to be "creepy." What's creepy about sending a gift?

—Bob

DEAR BOB:

You sort of answered your own question. You want to send a gift because you want to become part of this close-knit group of friends. This is well-intentioned but might seem a little pathetic—or perhaps even "creepy," as your boyfriend suggests—because you don't need to send gifts to win friends. This type of behavior probably resulted in you getting your ass kicked in junior high (unless the kids in your junior high were more genteel than those who attended seventh and eighth grade with Ms. Behavior).

Why don't you and Roger have a little soiree of your own and invite the people you'd like to get to know better? That way, you can be the hip gay man who is having a party of his own, rather than the desperate one who has his nose pressed to the window, begging for an invite.

In the future, when your relationship ceases to be "new," Roger should ask if he can bring you, thereby eliminating the problem of the "creepy" present. 10
