Bringing Up the Rear

What should I do about my girlfriend's penchant for anal sex?

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I've recently started dating someone who intimidates me sexually.

Anna has a thing for anal sex with a dildo (with me doing her). I'd never done it before, but the first time Anna asked me to do it, I said, "Sure, why not?" I didn't realize she'd want me to do it every time we made love! It's not my favorite thing, but she loves it, so I usually say yes.

She sometimes lets me lick her and fuck her the regular way, too, but only when I'm persistent. Often, when I go to touch her, she tries to move my hand right to the back end!

I've never met a woman who likes anal sex better than anything else. I can't help but wonder: If Anna and I stay together, does it mean I'm signing up for a lifetime of anal sex? Is this a fetish?

—Butts Are OK, But I Like Pussy Better

DEAR BUTTS ARE OK, BUT I LIKE PUSSY BETTER:

It's hard to know if Anna's desire for anal penetration is a preference or a fetish. Either way, it's a lot more ass sex than you're used to.

Sex, like other parts of a relationship, usually involves negotiation. If it works well, it doesn't explicitly sound like, "You do this for me and then I'll do this for you." (Or, "You can enter my front door now if you promise to knock on my back door later.") Hopefully it's more fluid than that, at least if you trust each other and freely express what you want.

If you and Anna stay together long enough to relax, get comfortable and experiment, you might find that you enjoy multiple ways of being together. (With any luck, some of them will involve her other body parts.) Butt [sic] if it turns out that Anna is entirely a back-door girl, you'll have to see if you develop a taste for it.

You don't need to figure it out right now: Live in the moment. In fact, take a note from Anna, and relax your sphincter.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

About a year ago, I said goodbye to my friend Nic, who had used me for money. Nic was my last friend, and I have spent the past year without a friend or confidante, mainly due to my poor social skills.

Recently, I have felt a strong urge to contact Nic. It is often overwhelming. I am not the only one who has felt alone. Scott, my ex-boyfriend, just wrote me an e-mail with the closing, "I love you so much."

How do I deal with these needs without skidding backward?

—Joe S.

DEAR JOE S.:

You haven't offered a lot of information, so it's hard to tell how Nic was using you. Did he treat you like an ATM/sugar daddy, or might you have overreacted to his borrowing money one too many times?

The phrasing of your last sentence ("How do I deal with these needs without skidding backward") is interesting. Do you equate your need for friendship with weakness? What do you mean by "skidding backward"? Do you fear that you can't say no to Nic if he asks for money, or are you concerned with some other sort of skidding? When you're with Nic, do you automatically resume bad social behavior—say, shooting drugs and blowing icky men for money—or are you talking about emotional despair? Unfortunate fashion choices?

In any case, what's up with Nic being your "last friend"? Are the people in your life really that disposable? Your issues seem to leave you feeling isolated and desperate. If your social skills are as poor as you say and you're unable to make new friends, you'll probably need assistance that goes far deeper than just joining the local queer cycling club or marching band.

Get thee to a therapist! It's time for you to discuss why it's so difficult for you to sustain friendships and why you're so confused about your ex-boyfriend Scott. Here's a pointer: Start from the very beginning. (We're talking Mommy's boobs.) JO
