In a Bind

How do I diplomatically divulge to dykes that I dabble with dick?

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I am single and open and having fun with lots of different people right now. I'm giving myself a year or two before I'd consider getting into another serious relationship.

Although I label myself a 100 percent dyke, one of my current playmates is a straight guy. It's not a big deal; I think of Jake as another flavor that I happen to enjoy. He's cool and easy to be with and always ready for sex. I don't even have to talk if I don't want to. We have no ties to each other, so it's fun.

The problem is that some of my other playmates think it's nasty that I see Jake regularly for sex. I don't want to stop seeing him. Generally, I'm not into lying.

So, can you think of a way that I can tell the ladies that I sometimes cozy up to dick that would help them accept it? (We always use a condom, so STDs aren't an issue.) It seems to be putting a damper on my love life.

—Playing the Field

DEAR PLAYING THE FIELD:

You might think of Jake as one big, juicy low-maintenance sex toy, but the other lesbians in your life won't be so generous. They'll view him as an actual hairy, grunting man—perhaps transformed in their imagination into the worst possible horror: a corporate creep or a caveman, whichever they believe is worse—which will make them uncomfortable, because if you have sex with him, that means you're a lesbian who is not like them, and what does that do to their definition of lesbians?

Worse still, maybe you actually are like them, which might indicate that they could still harbor a secret desire to sleep with men, too, in some tiny, deep pocket of their souls. How threatening! Some might find it necessary to disown you, to drown you, to extinguish you from the sisterhood.

But you asked if you should tell your female playthings that you have sex with a man. Well, it seems only fair to tell any sexual partner whether or not you're having sex with other people, but there's no reason to specify gender. If, however, a female date asks you directly, perhaps because she's heard through the rumor mill that you're a penis hound, you shouldn't lie and pretend that you don't have sex with men. If you're lucky, you'll find an occasional dyke who'll actually be aroused by the thought of you sitting on a dick.

Undoubtedly, Ms. Behavior will get e-mails from bisexuals, insisting that because you enjoy sex with Jake you're actually bisexual and should face up to it. However, your lack of romantic feelings for Jake coupled with your having clearly defined yourself as a lesbian is good enough for Ms. Behavior. So, listen up, lovely bisexuals: Occasionally dykes do sleep with men!

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I recently took a job with an advertising agency in a large building, on the 64th floor. Every morning on the elevator, several women from other floors flirt with me. My friends think this is hilarious, since I am a gay man and always have been.

I am out at my job and generally in my life, but I do not see fit to "come out" during a 45-second elevator ride. My friends say that this means I am closeted and that my smiling at these women and talking with them without letting them know I'm gay means I'm homophobic. What do you think?

—Elevator Man

DEAR ELEVATOR MAN:

It would be presumptuous to preemptively shout: "I'm gay! I'm gay! I love to suck cock!" to every woman who smiles at you in the elevator.

It sounds like you're perceived as cute and nonthreatening by this gaggle of flirting women. This means your clueless friends are probably incorrect to assume the elevator women believe you're available. In fact, it's quite likely that they're flirting with you because you're gay.

Here's a news flash, in case your friends have been living under a big gay boulder for the past decade: Straight women actually like gay men! They want to be friends with gay men! Most straight women who've never even seen Will & Grace have always wanted their own Will. You probably seem sweet enough to qualify, which is a compliment to you.

So, no, it doesn't sound like you're suffering from internalized homophobia. But if you feel compelled to prove it, you could always offer to wear a pair of Spandex culottes, sing Liza's greatest hits and kiss one of your male friends the whole way up to the 64th floor. jo
