Single White Female

I can't stop thinking about my roommate. Should I ask her out?

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I recently got a roommate through Craig's List. We are both single and 23. Sal and I haven't hung out much. Recently I accidentally saw her coming out of the shower and can't stop thinking about her. Would that ruin my good roommate situation if I tell her how I feel? It's really hard to find someone I want to live with, and I don't want to screw that up. Will these feelings go away? I only have one friend who I could talk to, and he says I just need to get laid.

Sal is muscular with her clothes on and secretly smooth underneath. Now I keep wondering how she'd look if she were pregnant. Is it too weird to ask someone out if you already live with her? Help!

Ms. Behavior
BY MERYL COHN

—Messed Up

DEAR MESSED UP:

What you're feeling may actually be lust or some kind of longing for a mommy—envisioning Sal pregnant with a big round belly and bursting breasts is the big clue. But please don't be embarrassed; nearly everyone has such moments, conscious or not, of wanting to reconnect to the original source, the first bosom.

You don't need to immediately figure out why you feel the way you do; you can sort it out while you slowly get to know Sal better. Asking her to go to the movies or to have dinner with you would be a noncommittal way to find out what she's really like beneath her tight and muscular-yet-secretly-feminine appearance. (Please note that Ms. Behavior said "beneath" and not "inside.")

Premature proclamations of love can be embarrassing if you later find out that you were spouting bullshit when really you just wanted to get jiggy. See how you feel when you spend time together. If there's chemistry between you when you spend time together, you'll both know it, and maybe your dream of having babies with her (or at least pressing your moist and hungry bodies together) will come true. If there isn't chemistry, your feelings will probably soon pass, and you won't have to worry about finding a new roommate.

Meanwhile, it does sound like you need to get laid. As soon as possible.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

My friend Katie was recently dumped by her girlfriend. Katie wants to remain friends because she wants to still be the other mom to Lauren's 4-year-old daughter, Sonia. Katie (who is wealthy but not filthy rich) plans to buy Lauren a car and a condo so that she and Sonia don't have to "change their lifestyle." I think it's crazy, but Katie says that it's just like a divorce settlement and that straight people do it all the time.

Anyway, here's the part that worries me: Lauren has a new girlfriend, and it seems like Katie doesn't know. I suspect that Lauren and the new GF are waiting until Katie pays for the condo and the car before they let everyone know about their relationship.

I am torn about whether to say something to Katie. I'm not one of her closest friends, but I care about her. On one hand, I feel like I should tell her so that she doesn't feel like a fool; on the other, I think it's none of my business. What do you think?

—Katie's Friend

DEAR KATIE'S FRIEND:

Historically, relationships often do involve commerce agreements—a donkey for your virgin daughter's hand in marriage, or a condo for continued participation in your toddler's life. Such agreements aren't objectively bad, as long as all parties (including the virgin and the toddler) are happy with the arrangement and participating freely.

Since you're not Katie's close friend, you can't be sure about what she knows about Lauren's dating life, and you shouldn't judge the choices she makes. It's unlikely that Katie believes that offering her gigantic gifts will keep Lauren from ever having another partner. And still, Katie might be willing to exchange a condo and a car for the possibility of being involved in Sonia's life, even if Lauren has a new girlfriend, and even if everyone else thinks it's a bad idea. Is she risking the possibility that she'll ultimately feel like a fool? Sure. But if it's OK with Katie, it should be OK with you. 10
