New Kid on the Block

Sexually inexperienced lesbian needs advice

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I am 39 and just starting to be with women. I have many questions because I don't have much sexual experience. I can't ask my friends; they're straight and wouldn't know what to say.

First, if you're just starting to be with someone sexually, is it helpful to tell the person what you like while it's happening? Or is that annoying because you're not letting her be herself? Is it better to wait and see if she figures it out?

I have more questions, but I'm embarrassed. I'll wait and see how you answer this before I go any further.

—Babe in the Lesbian Woods

Ms. Behavior
BY MERYL COHN

DEAR BABE IN THE LESBIAN WOODS:

You don't have to direct someone like a traffic cop to let her know what you like. You'll reveal a lot by allowing yourself to respond to her touch. If you moan enthusiastically or arch your body toward her, she'll know you like it and she'll be encouraged to continue. Or you could say something like "Yes, yes, yes" or "That's it!" or "Oh yeah" or "Oooh baby" or "Give it to me, Big Mama!" or "Fuck me!" or "Harder, harder, harder!" (Hopefully, you get the point, but let Ms. Behavior know if you need more help with this.)

If you're too directive the first couple of times, you might make her feel uptight or pre-empt some of what she'd figure out naturally, so give each other time to be together and feel your way through it. On the other hand, if it's really not working for you (in spite of decent chemistry, which counts for a lot), don't just lie there like a log and hope for the best. Find the balance between asking for what you like and bossing her around like a trick pony (which might make her feel like there's something wrong with her instincts). Be affirming even while you're being specific, so that she can relax.

It's better to focus on the positive, like "I like that, but softer, please" rather than "Don't do that" or "Wow, you're clumsy." If something hurts (and you don't want it to hurt), say "Ouch." Or "Excuse me, but your elbow is on my windpipe."

If, after the first two or three times, you want her to do something she's not doing—like, say, biting your nipples hard or slapping you around like the little whore you are—you can say, "I love having my nipples bitten hard" or "I wouldn't mind if you tossed me around to show me who's in charge, but please don't cause permanent injury." This will give her permission to treat you less than delicately, if she's up for it.

Ms. Behavior suspects that you will be well-guided by your instincts. She welcomes detailed progress reports.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I've had several boyfriends, but none has lasted more than six months. I don't think all the failures are my fault, but it's upsetting. I'm 30.

My therapist gave me strange advice; she thinks I should get a dog before dating anyone else. She says a dog will help prepare me for a relationship with a boyfriend. I've always liked dogs, but I don't know if it's a stupid idea or if she's right that it could be a "steppingstone."

I like dogs, but would having a dog really make me a better boyfriend? Should I be offended? Should I forget the whole thing and get a new therapist instead?

—Marky Mark

DEAR MARKY MARK:

Dogs tend to be good-willed, optimistic creatures who love you no matter what. They never show up with a computerized printout of your shortcomings, and they don't insult your mother (even if they wish they could). They sometimes do disgusting things; they eat garbage or roll on dead birds on the beach or drink toilet water, but you never have to worry that they love someone more than you, and they don't betray you by hooking up with your trainer at the gym.

Dogs are ultimately forgiving and devoted, even if you've been weird and moody and feel you don't deserve it. Not that you should be weird and moody; of course, you should treat your dog with love and kindness and respect. But your therapist might be on to something. If you allow yourself to become attached to a nice dog, you'll learn a lot about unconditional love and acceptance, and hopefully about offering it in return. Maybe your therapist thinks you need practice with showing up and being loving and consistent.

Also, perhaps she thinks you need to see yourself more clearly; when you're not getting along with your dog, it's usually obvious that it's your fault. 10
