Present Tense

How do I tell my best lesbian friend that I hate her gifts?

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I know this didn't reach you in time for the holidays, but because this issue threatens to be a problem for the rest of my life, I hope you'll answer it anyway.

Every year my best lesbian friend, Marta, gives me and my boyfriend a hideous Christmas tree ornament to hang on our branches. Last year it was wood-hewn, fair-trade Guatemalan ladies in a circle. The year before, a sparkly purple triangle with something pink and moist in the middle. (I don't know what it was.)

I feel I should humor Marta by hanging her ornament. It doesn't hurt anyone, right?

But my partner, Jack, wants to nip this tradition of eyesores in the bud. So, should we break it to her gently that we don't appreciate her gifts? Or should I hold my ground with Jack and insist that we don't hurt Marta's feelings?

—Gay Grinch

Ms. Behavior
BY MERYL COHN

DEAR GAY GRINCH:

You need to rethink your assertion that hanging Marta's tasteless ornaments doesn't hurt anyone, perhaps while considering the broken-window theory of crime management as a parallel model for your diminishing commitment to your aesthetic. (The broken-window theory suggests that neighborhoods change as broken windows aren't fixed and overflowing garbage isn't removed. People who live or work in the area begin to withdraw, then criminals overtake the area.)

Relaxing your standards so you don't insult Marta might seem innocuous enough, but imagine what happens next: If you keep Marta as a friend for the next 30 years, your annual Christmas tree will soon be overwhelmed by tasteless ornaments from her contributions alone. (How quickly this happens depends on the size and scale of Marta's ornaments in relation to your tree and the room.) Other friends will assume you actually like folksy wimmin's art, resulting in even more frightening gifts. You might also find that you feel inexplicably more comfortable wearing shawls, clogs and multicolored touks.

It seems you have two options: 1) Tell Marta that her ornaments are so special that they deserve their own tree. Then go buy a tiny 2-foot-high tree that you keep in a corner of your apartment (perhaps in the kitchen or bathroom), and adorn it with Marta's special ornaments, or 2) Tell Marta that you no longer believe in the exchange of gifts and the commercialization of a spiritual holiday. Perhaps she'll think you've had a spectacular spiritual awakening. Then you can come up with a list of charitable groups you want to support. Give Marta the list, and tell her that you and your boyfriend are so blessed with love and good friends that you want to stop exchanging Christmas gifts and that you'd prefer to instead donate money to hungry giraffes or children.

P.S. Please don't be coy; Ms. Behavior is certain that you know what the pink and moist ornament means to suggest. Now clap your hands over your ears and say "La la la" three times, to dispel any negative feelings that may have arisen.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

Do I have to buy presents for the offspring of all my lesbian friends? It's not just Christmas, but also Easter and birthdays, and sometimes even confirmations. (I don't even know what a confirmation is.)

Frankly, I've always thought a highlight of being a dyke was not producing rugrats. Gifts for babies and toddlers will break my bank, especially now that it seems to be a requirement for all lesbians to procreate, or at least adopt. When it comes time for gift giving, can't I just ignore anyone younger than 30? If I have extra money, I'd prefer to spend it on a nice bottle of wine for myself.

—Annoyed

DEAR ANNOYED:

Feel free to buy something inexpensive, like a coloring book, for the rugrats, or collect some seashells for them. It is, after all, the thought that counts, and you're clearly a thoughtful person.

Or, since you are obviously filled with the spirit of holidays and giving, perhaps you should put on an apron, roll up your sleeves and bake cookies for the children! This is a practical and cheap way for you to express the love that is clearly just bursting from your heart.

If it's too much trouble to bake cookies from scratch, feel free to buy the mix. If it's too difficult to bake them yourself, just stick a bow on the box of mix, introduce the toddlers to your oven, and wish them luck. Then pour yourself a nice glass of wine and sit down and relax. 10
