Disturbing the Peace

What should we do about our friends' screaming-loud orgasms?

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

My partner and I have been together for four years. We still have good sex, but we're low-key about it.

Last summer we went on a weeklong vacation with our friend Myra and her new girlfriend, Kate, and we all rented a beach house together. We had a great time, but my partner and I were disturbed (literally!) by Myra and Kate's screaming-loud orgasms every night until at least 2 a.m.

We are not anti-sex or anti-fun, but we resented having to buy earplugs. When I say it was loud, I'm not talking about a dull sound; I mean real yelling and screaming. I still can't even look at Myra or Kate without thinking, "Oooh, do it, baby, do it, do it."

The real problem is that they want to go on vacation with us again. We love hanging out with them, but not if we'll end up sleep-deprived like last year.

What should we do? Is there a delicate way to let them know?

—Traveling Fools

DEAR TRAVELING FOOLS:

Try going the direct route. Tell Myra her that the turgid state she and Kate were in last summer destroyed your sleep schedule. Tell her you're hesitant to travel with her again, unless she will either agree to take a solemn vow of celibacy for all of the hours between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m., or allow you to seal their mouths with duct tape before bed.

If the solemn promise feels too controlling and you can afford it, consider renting totally separate accommodations, which would allow Myra and Kate to rub up against each other and sigh and whimper all night long while you and your partner snooze peacefully in another beach house several blocks away.

Of course, the universe might have taken care of this for you. Your friends were in a juicy new relationship last summer, which meant they were feeling all infatuated and inflamed. They couldn't help themselves: They had to paw each other and moan all night and didn't care who knew or who heard their screams of passion.

Sadly, now that they've been together for more than a year, it's unlikely their sex is still raucous. It's probably been several months since they've been up in the middle of the night, fucking like loud little bunnies and awakening everyone around them.

DEAR MS. BEHAVIOR:

I'm going back to school in the fall. Meanwhile, my freshman roommate, Aaron, is coming to visit me.

We've talked on the phone a few times and e-mailed each other, and I've noticed that he has recently resorted to his childhood vocabulary. For example, he has repeatedly used the words "gay" or "queer" as shorthand for bad or stupid. He knows that I'm a big fag, so it seems particularly crappy for him to talk this way. He doesn't seem totally straight to me, either (although he's only dated girls since I've known him), so I'm not sure why he's doing it.

Should I treat it as a joke and tell him to knock it off? Should I figure it's just a word and no big deal? Or should I ask him directly what his problem is?

We have been friends since the first day of school, and I don't want to give up the friendship, but I'm also not good with confrontation. What's your advice?

—Faggy

DEAR FAGGY:

Aaron might be queer or at least queer-curious, or maybe he just wants to talk about your being gay and doesn't know how to bring it up without being annoying. First, try telling Aaron directly that his derogatory use of the word "gay" and "queer" is insulting, and ask him not to do it anymore. Hopefully, he'll understand where you're coming from and stop.

On the other hand, perhaps he really does want to blow you. If he continues to use the words in a negative way (or makes other insensitive comments), tell him that you know that he really, really wants you. Tell him that you used to make fun of gay people, too (when you were 12, before you realized you were queer), and that you've since learned that derogatory use of the word "gay" generally occurs during the earliest stages of coming out.

Either way, Aaron will probably stop using language so loosely. You'll have planted the seed of self-doubt and homosexual panic, so he'll probably feel too self-conscious to continue to use derogatory words. 10
