ADVICE

DIRTY WORDS SEX & RELATIONSHIPS

I'm bi. I only tell people whom I trust, and only if and when I think they can handle it. The problem is the gay community sees me as a "fauxbian". I love women, and don't feel my sexuality grants me wiggle room. Also, I dedicate myself entirely to whomever I am with. My situation is that women, who are interested in me, use me as their first experience. I can't have fulfilling relationship with a woman because of a stigma? That is sad. How can I overcome such a seemingly daunting social cast?

- sigh- Never Maybe

Getting what you want always starts with an act of bravery. In this case, it's coming out. Telling people that you're bisexual puts the ball in their court. People that love you don't get to choose the things they like about you, and leave the rest behind. When I came out, I was afraid it was an instant commitment to starting a relationship with another woman. That's ridiculous. Even if you went your whole life only dating men, it wouldn't invalidate your identity. Tell people. Eventually, your friends will start doing the work for you. It becomes part of your social being, like your eye color, but way more interesting.

Be brave, "Never Maybe". The naysayers bore me to tears.

I've been with my girlfriend for almost a year now. I came into our relationship with a few minor STDs. I should have told her right away, but since we've always had safe sex, I decided it wasn't important. We're on the rocks now, and I'm wondering if I should tell her, or let it go?

- Nervous and Sad

Wow. What a great kicker to the end of your relationship. That was sarcasm. I feel that I should say it's sarcasm, because you and I don't adhere to the same kind of reality.

I don't know what "minor" STDs are, but maybe you meant "nonlethal"? STDs that don't
