Unsung Heroes

There are, we all know, a number of "unsung heroes" in every school. Among them are the second teams in athletics, debate, and typing, those who afford the competition before the first teams are definitely picked.

The harder the second teams work the harder the first team has to work to keep ahead. The team that plays the best game, or gives the best oratorical display, or writes the highest number of words a minute in a contest wins only because each member had to work more industriously to keep ahead of his rivals.

These are not the only people in a school who get very little credit for what they do. Our play director, and our shorthand and typing and debate coaches work hard and worry perhaps more about the outcome of a contest than the contestants themselves. If the particular team wins it is we members that receive the applause but on the other hand if the team loses the blame is often placed with the teacher, coach or director.

Let us be more careful upon whom we place the blame for the loss of a contest and be more lenient in giving our applause so that all who work may profit by it in one way or another.

Attention!

What would be more humiliating than calling upon a friend, who devoted his attention to reading a book or writing a letter while you were attempting to carry on a conversation? Would we be very likely to call upon him again? But after all, what is the difference between this and an audience composed of students who occupy their time in this manner while a speaker is delivering an address in which he is trying to bring out points that will benefit his hearers.

Of course we feel many times that it is absolutely necessary for us to prepare for our next hour class, but do we never think of the reputation we are helping to build for the school?

Let us all be responsible for our own actions hereafter and even though we can find nothing of interest to our own particular self, there are probably others who do. At any rate we can be polite enough to listen and by this learn a lesson in courtesy.

The only place you can get a chicken dinner for a dollar or less is in the feed and grain store.

Joy Addresses Students

Mr. Joy of Bellview spoke to the Student Body about "Farming as a Vocation."

He told of changes in machinery and methods of doing farm work which led to a change in farming.

The speaker enumerated advantages and disadvantages of farming. Some of the advantages were: A farmer is his own boss and has his own working hours.

The disadvantages are: Long working hours, hard marketing, and the work has to be done at inconvenient times.
