Sage-grouse

Dinkins said, "None of the sage grouse in Baker are going to have a GPS backpack. They're going to be some down in the reference sites that will. That's daily data, with location data more than once a day.

"Ten of the ravens are going to be collared, and will have GPS units, in Baker, so, we'll get more refined data daily.

"All of the birds that have a backpack or collar that's a VHF, we'll have to ground track them. We'll get one or two locations per week, which is a pretty typical way of going about collecting data for these types of analyses ... It would be great if they could all be GPS units, but they're much, much more expensive."

Catching sage grouse involves soft captures at night, using a flashlight shined in their eyes, and tube nets placed over the top of them, one at a time. "There are other methods, but, that's the softest way to capture sage grouse," Dinkins said. On the raven side of things, the most effective way is to use a leg hold trap, similar to one used to catch mammals, which are padded, with a small gap, to avoid breaking the ravens' legs, he said.

It's early in the study, Dinkins said there aren't any results to share yet, and he didn't necessarily have a theory about what may be occurring, but, "If we assume that ravens may be an issue, what I'd found in the past was, populations of sage grouse that are in severe decline, and that have a small spacial footprint—so they're not buffered with immigrants being able to come in—those are the ones where conservation action, quickly relieving one of their stressors—ravens in this case—could help them to pass recovery."

But, he said that, if non-lethal mechanisms are put into place, in order to manipulate the number of ravens, there would be greater success. "Really, that's what's in the frame work for designing this project. You'd be reducing carrying capacity, or, the ability of sagebrush, for the ravens. If you reduce food resources in the winter in Baker County, then, not as many ravens will be able to over-winter there, which, over time, reduces your abundance."

Dinkins said, "Juniper is a mechanism that could be in play, behind the increasing utility of sagebrush, to something like a raven, or other raptors ... Yes, I have thought about that quite a bit, so, the raven students are going to be analyzing how, collecting data on structures (man-made and natural), so, junipers would be one of those ..."

Dinkins' previous research on the topic includes his dissertation, "Common Raven Density and Greater Sage-Grouse Nesting Success in Southern Wyoming: Potential Conservation and Management Implications," written in 2013, as part of his PhD in Wildlife Biology. He joined the OSU faculty last September.
