THE INTERNAL NOT THE EXTERNAL

It seems to be the spirit of the times to be dissatisfied with what we have.

Do we see someone with more than we have, especially among our associates, we want all that that person has, and entirely overlook others of our associates who have less and who in turn will become more dissatisfied when they see us added to those who have more than they do.

Did we wish only for the things which mean comfort for ourselves, for the things which make us better able to instruct others in a better way to live and for the things which would enable us to in some way make others happier, our wishes might be noble ones, but to have things merely for the one purpose of making a display of them is not only inelegant but is the underlying cause of the spirit of dissatisfaction and unrest. We not only keep ourselves dissatisfied but we irritate those who wish to make a similar display.

We are led to make these remarks by the case of the man who has just been elected to the highest office within the gift of the people of his native city, the same in which as a child he was the victim of an accident which robbed him of his eyesight.

Not having his eyesight, he probably did not note when he was not dressed as some of his schoolmates were dressed. He did not note that the furnishings of his home were more meager than the furnishings in the homes of his friends.

He did not even complain that he was handicapped as none of his mates were handicapped. He did not complain that his mates had more than wealth of any magnitude could buy—the precious gift of sight. That such was the case is shown by the fact that he graduated from the grades and high school, not only with those of his own age but with such honors that he won a university scholarship.

It is most refreshing to think that in this great democratic country it is possible for a lad without worldly goods and without eyesight to get an education equal to that available to the wealthy, and this thought in part recompenses for disgust with those whose temperaments are such that they can not absorb education if there be any lack of bodily adornment or the least dash in the appearance of that adornment.

Those who think have observed that only once in centuries is a person remembered for the lavish raiment he wore, while the thousands whose names are an inspiration to greater effort are those of whom there is no record of the kind of clothes they wore, except in exceptional cases like that of Abraham Lincoln, whose clothes were quite in contrast to those of Beau Brummel.

It has been true for ages, it is true now, and it ever will be true that we are remembered for the things we do and not for display of wealth. The clothes which we wear now may appear hideous to those of another generation, but the things we think and the deeds we do will no matter what style without regard to the number of ages through which they may live.

THE ABBREVIATED CHRISTMAS.

The Rainier Review takes up the cudgels against the "Xmas" spelling of Christmas. In newspaper work, of course, that kind of an abbreviation is taboo, as it should be. Representing Christ with a cross, as The Review says, is unfortunate. He might have gone stronger and called it inelegant and almost sacrilegious. The question in our mind is whether or not the abbreviation came about in the manner The Review, and many others with a commendable zeal for improvement of our language, suggest. "Christ" comes from a Greek word, the definition of which is "the anointed." The first letter of this Greek word is "X." It seems more likely to us that the abbreviation comes down to us from a time when those who observed Christmas were more familiar with the Greek language than are we today, and that the "X" never was intended to represent the cross. However, we are glad to join The Review in suggesting that the word be spelled in full.

If you haven't used the little Red Cross stickers on your Christmas mail you have not imbibed the Christmas spirit and are likely to make the recipients of your letters think you are either selfish or thoughtless.

It pays to read the wantads. **
