"Ole and Inga Talk It Over"

BY J. D. SMULL, IN THE ALEXANDRIA, MINN. POST-NEWS

This is the first of a series of dialogues in which Ole and Inga talk over the Non-Partisan League. The stories were originally printed in The Post-News, of Alexandria, Minn., and had considerable influence upon politics in that state.

OLE HANSON JOINS THE LEAGUE.

On a pleasant evening last fall a comfortable looking automobile picked its way over a rather rutty road in Liberty township, Prosperity county, South Dakota.

"You're late, Ole. Did the tires trouble you again?" It was Mrs. Hanson, the wife, who spoke.

Now Mrs. Hanson, whose first name was Ingeborg and who went by the short name of Inga in the family, had been married to Ole thirty years and she knew his moods well.

"You seem to feel pretty good to-night, Ole. Has what gone up some?" inquired Inga.

"What gone up? I should say not. It won't go up while we farmers have any 'Big Biz' will see to that," replied Ole.

Inga looked him over for a minute. "Big Biz," what are you talking about Ole? Who is he?"

"Big Biz," said Ole, "Big Biz," why it's not a man; well, it's 'Big Biz.' I didn't know myself how us farmers have been robbed until I met Jim Bower in town and he told me all about it, but we are going to get them, Inga. Those robbers in the towns and the cities are going to be kicked out. We are going to run this country." And Ole sat down to his supper with a satisfied air.

Mrs. Hanson looked surprised. Never before had she seen her husband so aggressive along these lines and never before had he expressed himself as desatisfied with his condition.

Jim Bower, that good-for-nothing socialist, what has happened to make you listen to him? You always called him a lazy, good-for-nothing loafer who wanted other people to divide up what they had to keep him," said Inga, now somewhat interested.

"Well, I ain't sticking up for Jim Bower, but he's got a lot of knowledge about how us farmers have been getting held up and he's a league organizer now."

"What are you talking about, Ole? This League of Nations I was reading about? What's that got to do with us and your getting held up for over $2 a bushel for your wheat?"

"You women can't understand anything. League of nations, nonsense! I am talking about the Non-Partisan League, the great farmers' organization. You'll hear a lot about it when we win out next year."

"Maybe we don't know much, Ole, but we don't buy stock in packing plants," said Inga.

Ole shrugged his shoulders at this reference, as he had invested several hundred dollars in a packing plant that had never brought any returns, but his eye fell upon a small white button on his coat and he turned it toward her.

Inga had just noticed the small white button on Ole's coat and with a woman's curiosity she wanted to know all about it.

"That's a Non-Partisan League button, and it says 'We'll Stick,' and you bet we're going to," said Ole, now warming up to his subject.

"Do they have to label you with a button to make you stick to this league or whatever you call it? How much did Jim Bower get out of you for all this stuff he's been giving you?"

"Women don't understand these things, but it only cost $16 to wear that button, and I guess we farmers can afford it. We are going to get millions back when we get what they got in North Dakota."

"So you paid $16 to this here organizer to give you a lot of promises did you? If one of us women should go to town and some good-for-nothing woman should get up a society that promised to make our hens lay two eggs a day, and tell us that you men had been robbing us by not paying us wages for doing housework and helping on the farm, and we paid her $16 to put a label on us, Ole Hanson, you'd think we had gone distracted. You'd have said all women are fools." And Inga took an extra cup of coffee to strengthen her for an argument.

"If 'Big Biz' hadn't cheated us out of what belonged to us on our stock and our wheat, you could have been living in a mansion in the city and wearing silk dresses," said Ole. "This man Townley, who is at the head of this league, is going to put us farmers right. We are going to have the state own all the elevators and flour mills, and we are going to run the government for the farmers' benefit for a while."

"Ole, you've been a pretty good man to me, and you and me got richer than we ever thought we would, and we brought up a family, and now you just find out after working forty years that somebody robbed you. It seems to me if I'd done as well as you have and made so much money, I would want that fellow, 'Big Biz,' to keep on robbing me some more so I could make more money. This fellow you call league organizer, when did he put any money in your pocket? If he know so much why don't he make some himself? Ole, you always been good republican and go to county convention, and you have a chance to go to legislature yourself. Now when you get sixty years old along some fellow and tell you you always been a fool all your life, and he gets your $16 to put a pin on you to show other people you acknowledge you always been a fool and let somebody rob you."

Ole looked somewhat indignant and somewhat crestfallen, but he felt that when he didn't know much about those things and he would in time enlist his wife's sympathy for the movement.

"I got a letter from Hans," said Ole, and he says the way those people in Europe live would be an insult to a good American hog, and we ought to be thankful we live in the good old America."

Hans was the pride of the Hanson family, a strong, stalwart American farm lad of 23. He had been in the army since America entered the war and was now in Germany with the army of occupation.

"Well, Ole, we hear what Hans says about this league business when he comes home, but I guess we both do our sticking to the farm together each."

"When we get our program working things will be different for us farmers. We are going to unite the laborer and the farmer and run this government a while for the benefit of us down-trodden producers," returned Ole.

"Yes, Ole, you will do wonders, you and those good-for-nothing laboring men you hired last summer that charged you 60 cents an hour and wanted to work 8 hours a day. You will run the government all right, but you will pay for it and the laborers and lazy organizers will live off you. A fine mess you will make. It's a good thing us women can vote now."

And Inga piled up the supper dishes. "If I'd thought women didn't have more sense I wouldn't've voted for that suffrage. But you can't blame them. They don't get out much."

"Ole, you go to bed. You're coming down with that flu stuff or you wouldn't talk such nonsense. You take a drink of that stuff in the cellar and you get over this foolishness in the morning."
