"Ole and Inga Talk It Over"

BY J. D. SMULL, IN THE ALEXANDRIA, MINN., POST-NEWS

OLE AND INGA ON THE PAPERS.

VI.

"I'm going to stop that paper," said Ole Hanson, as he threw down the local weekly and looked appealingly at his wife.

"What's the matter, Ole? Has the editor forgot to put in your name in town six times this week?" said his wife Inga.

"I don't want him to put my name in his paper. He's been bought up by 'big biz.' He's one of the kept press and I ain't going to pay him for abusing us farmers," and Ole set the coffee pot on the range.

Mr. and Mrs. Ole Hanson had been regular subscribers to the local weekly ever since it was started. The editor had come to town as a young man, and by patient work had built up a modest business and until the Non-Partisan league started he had always had the confidence of the farmers.

"I always thought you liked editor and said he was a pretty good fellow. He ain't made as much money as you farmers. What he say about you?" inquired Inga.

"Why, he says our leaders is socialists and Townley is leading us into making fools of ourselves. I'm going to stop the paper the first time I go to town," said Ole.

"Maybe editor tell the truth. Do you farmers try to stop the paper every time sermon don't suit you? If you stop paper then I take it," said Inga.

"Us farmers is a-goin' to start a paper of our own so we can get the truth, and we are going to have an editor who won't call us I. W. W.s. I'd like to know what we pay an editor for, anyway," remarked Ole reaching for the coffee pot.

"I suppose next time you eat too much dinner and you say you got the rheumatism and call doctor you want him to give you rheumatism for stomach ache? You want doctor to say what you think, not what he knows," said Inga.

"You are always twisting things around, Inga. These here country editors are bought up by 'big biz' and they're fighting our league, and we ain't a-going to stand for it," said Ole with emphasis.

"I never seen a country editor who looked as if he had any 'big biz' money. Most of 'em look as if subscribers was slow pay. I rather believe country editor who live among us all his life and have property here than some fellow who is working for your league for what money he can get out of it," said Inga.

"How much you put in new paper, Ole?" "Well, they're selling stock in our new paper, and I guess my share will be about $100. We're going to raise $10,000," said Ole with some pride.

"$100 pay for old paper for 50 years, and $10,000 more than all the school houses in the district cost. That much build a fine church. If township spend that much on church or school house you fellows would kick," remarked Inga.

"When we get in power and Townley gets a chance to fix our laws the way he did in North Dakota we'll get it all back," said Ole.

"How much you pay new editor?" inquired Inga.

"I think the organizer said we would pay him about $50 a week," said Ole.

"I guess if old editor got $50 a week he think he was 'big business.' Suppose the paper don't make enough to pay. Who pay the bills?" inquired Inga.

"Oh, I suppose we may have to help out to get it started, but us farmers can afford it. We will make it out when we get what Wall street has been robbing us of," ventured Ole.

"So because old editor try to keep you farmers from letting them socialists lead you around, you are going to hire a city fellow to come out and print a lot of stuff some other city fellows in St. Paul write up," said Inga.

"There you are abusing our league again. I guess us farmers is a-runnin' this league, and if the editors don't suit us we will fire 'em mighty quick. Of course Townley has writers to tell our side of the business," said Ole.

"Ole Hanson, you is pretty good business head on everything but league and I guess Townley he sure got you on that. You say 'big biz' buy country editor. Well, Townley he's smarter than 'big biz.' Instead of payin' country editor he make the farmers buy the whole printer establishment and then pay for runnin' it and he gets stuff in it for nothing. I guess 'big biz' got nothing on him," and Inga poured another cup of coffee.

"We will fix that town editor for callin' us I. W. W.s and socialists. We will make them merchants advertise in our paper or we won't trade with 'em," said Ole.

"I thought you believed in a free press," said Inga. "You want to put old editor out because he have opinion of his own and you want to club storekeeper because he won't advertise. Suppose they do what you want and then you change your mind? I suppose they got to change too or you club 'em again. I guess storekeeper had better advertise where he please and you buy where you buy cheapest," responded Inga.

"Do you suppose we're a-goin' to stand for being called Bolsheviks and I. W. W.s?" said Ole.

"Editor don't call you any such thing. Your organizer and editor do what boys call the baby act—editor call leaders socialists and they pass back along to you farmers and you take it. Why don't you tell organizers and editors to fight their own battles. You say big business buy country editor. Townley buy you farmers by promising more money for crops," said Inga.

"There ain't any use of arguin' this thing with women. They ain't progressive like us men," entered Ole.

"We are a little slow, Ole, but we don't believe in puttin' money in newspapers and hirin' a city fellow to tickle our ears and feed us up on a lot of socialist stuff that right down in our hearts we don't believe in. We rather trust the old editor who's been giving us the news since we was young folks."

We women ain't a-goin' to have any busted paper plants on our hands, and we ain't goin' to chip in to keep the thing a-runnin' until it does bust. Your Leader paper is always talkin' about the kept press. Well, the only kept press I seen around here is your league paper. They don't even try to graze for a livin' but they expect you farmers to feed them oats and earn the whole year 'round. Did you read Hans' letter?" said Inga, preparing to retire.

Ole saw his wife was in no mood for arguing, so he did not follow up the argument, but said "So Hans is coming home from Europe. Well, he's seen a lot of it and he can tell us the truth about this Bolshevik business."

Ole turned out the light and got into bed, but he quickly got out and exclaimed "What in thunder you got in my bed, I'd like to know? Do you expect a feller to sleep on a rock pile?"

Inga lit the light and looked at Ole and smiled. "Well, Ole, I guess it's my fault this time. I hid them league books on free love and religion under the mattress and I forgot to take 'em out. I guess it's a pretty hard for you farmers to get a good night's sleep in that kind of company."
