"Ole and Inga Talk It Over"

BY J. D. SMULL, IN THE ALEXANDRIA, MINN., POST-NEWS

ALL IS WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

VIII.

"Ole, you forgot to put on your 'We'll Stick' button," said Inga Hanson to Ole, as they finished dressing for the double wedding which was to take place at their home that afternoon.

"I'm a goin' to put mine in my pocket and if the other boys wear 'em I'll put mine on, maybe," said Ole.

The Hanson home was decorated for the wedding and everything was all ready for the feast which was to follow. The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Hanson's daughter Christine to the son of the local banker, and the marriage of their son Hans to the local editor's daughter was an event of more than ordinary importance. Hans had just returned from the war and was to edit the paper which was violently opposed to the Non-Partisan league, while Ole Hanson was a prosperous farmer and had been one of its strongest supporters. Ole had criticized the bankers harshly, and now his daughter was to be claimed by one of them. Almost all the farmers in the Hanson neighborhood were league members, so much speculation had been indulged in as to how Ole would manage to get along.

Not long after Ole and his wife finished dressing the automobiles began to arrive and soon the barnyard was full of them. The farmers and townspeople who were the honored guests were pleasantly greeted by Ole and Inga, and the home was soon filled with an intelligent, well-dressed company, most of them farmers, and many wearing the league buttons.

"The way these farmers and wives dressed up don't look much like big biz has been gettin' 'em," remarked Inga to Ole, as they surveyed the assemblage.

"They do look pretty prosperous," returned Ole.

"I guess you and I can remember when all of 'em put together couldn't raise enough cash to buy a Ford," said Inga as they prepared for the ceremony.

Captain Hans Hanson was a manly young fellow, and Ole and Inga never felt prouder of him than at this moment, and when the ceremony was over and Hans and his bride and their daughter Christine and her husband were receiving congratulations from their friends, Inga happened to remember Hans' promise.

"Hans, you promised to tell us all about Europe," said Inga. "When we all get sat down you get to tell the folks."

"It's hardly a proper place," said Hans, "but as long as I promised, if our friends care to hear it, I shall be glad to repeat a few observations I made abroad."

Everyone insisted, so when the company was seated Hans began.

"I am not going to tell any personal experiences," said Hans, "but I am going to compare conditions in Europe and America and you can draw your own conclusions. Almost all of you farmers came here poor and now you are well-to-do, and to you who belong to this Non-Partisan league, what I say may change your minds. In the first place, I want you to know that in Europe you men would not be classed as peasants. You would be classed as land owners and capitalists. You are the class which the socialists and Bolsheviks in Europe hate. The socialist agitators in America who want you to adopt their theories do not tell you that wherever socialism has been tried in Europe it has failed completely. Germany has tried it and it ruined her production of coal to such an extent that measures had to be taken to force men to work. In France the farmers do not make as much money in their whole lives as you farmers do in one good year. A farmer in France or Germany or any other European country cannot expect to own more than a few acres of land, and his life savings, living with economy, would not buy one of your automobiles. If the farming class of any European country could get to America in a body they would all come tomorrow. The people of Europe look upon us who live in America as the most fortunate in the world, and while you are all well fed and have a comfortable surplus in the bank they are clamoring for something to eat and for work. It seems strange that in America men are trying to get along with short hours and do less work, while in every European country the cry is 'give us any kind of work and something to eat.' Now this condition in Europe has produced unrest and almost a revolutionary demand for a change, so the masses have turned toward socialism as a remedy. What they mean by socialism is to make such men as you farmers divide up what they have with them. You farmers know that almost all the fellows in this country who are poor have had just as good a chance as you have, and because they are lazy or squandered their money they have not succeeded. Now they are blaming their own lack of thrift on 'big biz' or the government. There are no doubt abuses in our state and national government, but they are nothing compared to any other government on earth. You men have the means in your power to correct them through the ballot. The trouble with most of you is that you are so busy making money that you won't go to the primaries and elections and then you complain because the men elected do not represent you. My advice is, my friends, stop hating the banker, the merchant or the editor. Instead of hating him, work with him. All work together. This Non-Partisan league teaches class hatred and your leaders are taking you straight into the socialist camp. If the American government is ever overturned by this class the whole world will go back a thousand years. I have said more than I intended and I hope I have not offended anyone."

The league members looked somewhat thoughtful, but they took the talk good naturedly and began to discuss it when Inga announced dinner was ready.

The dining room was decorated with many flags, and the pictures of Washington, Lincoln and Roosevelt were decorated with bunting. In fact it looked more like a patriotic dinner than a wedding feast. At each place was a ribbon badge with the words "We'll Stick to the Government" printed on it.

"Now," said Inga, "before we begin we're a goin' to sing 'America.'"

Never was it sung with more feeling than by the assembled company. The conversation was lively when it was proposed through Inga that the "Star Spangled Banner" be sung, and again the room rang with melody. All at once Inga arose, and, going to the pictures of Washington, Lincoln and Roosevelt, she pulled a hidden string and rolled down in front of them the pictures of Towles, Mills and Frazer. The company looked on in amazement.

"Which you like best?" asked Inga.

"Now Inga, you know I'm sick of this league business," said Ole. "You just pull them things down and burn 'em up and put them there books on free love in the same fire, and all us farmers will promise never to talk league again. Won't we?" and Ole looked at the other leaguers, who all assented.

"All right," said Inga, "we'll have a big fire in the yard, only the 'We'll Stick' buttons must go too. You men put 'em in this dish." And Inga passed around a dish, and as she came to each leaguer he deposited his button.

After the fire was out and the company had returned to the house, the young people began dancing and Ole could not resist, so off came his shoes and in his home knit socks he began "Old Dan Tucker," but he suddenly stopped and held up his foot.

"I've run a nail in my foot," he exclaimed, and Inga came to his aid. She looked at his foot and picked out a "We'll Stick" pin and held it up.

"I guess we'll keep this one and put it away with them buffalo horns and Indian relics for the grandchildren," said Inga. "They'll sure think we had some queer spells."
