THE EDUCATED VOTER

Writing in a Portland paper, George S. Craig, of Enterprise, says the people do not study the issues, and points to the results of the recent election, particularly the vote upon measures, as proof of his statement.

Let us see.
Linn and Benton counties were given permission to issue bonds to take up outstanding warrants. A purely local measure and the people of the counties affected wanted it. The voters seem to have exercised wisdom in acting upon those measures.

Single tax was snuffed under. Surely that was a display of wisdom.
The exposition tax was defeated. The voters had not been taken into the confidence of those behind the measure. No one attempted to explain, until the last moment, just what the exposition tax meant. The voters thought it better to vote for what seemed to them a certainty than to vote a tax when they were not certain what the tax would mean. Almost no campaign was made by proponents of the tax. The voters can not be blamed for their action. There is no proof that they did not study all the information they had at hand.

The income tax was defeated. The proposed amendment merely directed the legislature to put an income tax law into effect. It would be better for the legislature to propose a complete law and put it up to the people.

The only measure of importance acted upon favorably was the amendment to the compulsory school law. Surely there was no lack of information there. Speakers for both sides covered the state. A campaign of education was carried on. There is every evidence that the people were well informed as to what the amendment would do and voted for what they wanted. If such is not the case, possibly after a law has been in effect a few years they will become so well informed that even our Enterprise friend will not complain about the way they vote.

THE RED CROSS IN TIMES OF PEACE

It is rather peculiar that during the war, when there were so many other demands upon the pocketbook, it was many times easier to put over a successful Red Cross drive than it is now, when this is one of the few great public subscriptions which there is to be met.

This probably is due to the belief on the part of many that the Red Cross completed its work when the war ended. Such is far from the case. The Red Cross had been doing its great work for humanity many years before the world war seemed even a probability and it will continue its work long after world wars shall be no more.

Its work in times of peace is much simpler than it was in times of war, for it does not have to go to the battle front, but the work it does in times of peace is more arduous because it is done without any flare of trumpets and with little credit for the relief and good cheer it carries to millions.

The ravages of tuberculosis are none the less severe in times of peace and the work the Red Cross does in fighting the white plague is none the less a service to humanity and means none the less to the patient on the white cross the services of the Red Cross nurses to the boys in the war hospitals.

Misery is not less hard to bear because it comes in times of peace and the things the Red Cross does to carry relief and cheer to the sick and starving is none the less efficacious in restoring health and preserving life.

The Red Cross is at all times deserving of the support of those who have sympathy for the sufferers among their fellow beings.

Your dollar is but a trifle to you. It may mean all to some sick or needy one.

The Oregonian's editorial page usually contains a great deal that is worth reading. That was particularly so Friday last, when it used an editorial that expressed identically the same ideas upon the state wolf bounty that were expressed upon the same date by The Sentinel. The Oregonian could not have received its copy of The Sentinel in time to have stolen the idea, so the only logical explanation is that it has caught up with The Sentinel in expressing progressive ideas.

Is man consistent when he admires the undraped figure in marble and finds fault with the peek-a-boo waist.

Why do we cuss Adam for yielding to the tempter? The papers are full of the foolish things that the men of today do "just for a girl." The Adam of today is not much of an improvement over our famous progenitor who rented the ground flat in the Garden of Eden.

One nice thing about a small baby is that it doesn't seem to care whether anyone listens to its talk and is indifferent about a reply.

If we didn't keep our eyes so closely riveted on the mistakes of others we might see our own.

It seems as if you can never get so well off but that there are a few a little better off, nor so bad off but that there are a few a little worse off.

A lot of people tell us what a pleasant place heaven is, yet hesitate about going themselves.
