THE EYE IS A LIVING, CHANGING HIGHLY ADAPTABLE ORGAN

Optometry is the measurement of the human eye for the purpose of diagnosing the defects and prescribing proper glasses for the relief thereof.

The optometrist is a specialist in examining eyes.

Diseased eyes and defective eyes are entirely different matters, to be handled in thoroughly different manners. If glasses are needed nothing else will take their place. There is no substitute.

In putting on new glasses, it should be remembered that a period of adaptation, during which more or less discomfort is experienced, must be gone through. It would be as foolish to expect eyes to adapt themselves instantly to the completely changed conditions of work induced by the new lenses, as it would be foolish to expect any other defect of the body to disappear instantly.

The eye is a living, changing, highly adaptable organ that can be driven to function long after the margin of safety has been passed. But when this is done, the penalty must inevitably be paid, even though nature apparently defers collection of her debt.

The frequent examination of eyes that are being built up and the yearly examination of eyes that are apparently functioning perfectly, is but the veriest common sense. D. J. Scholl, Optometrist.

It is interesting to notice how men of national prominence whose time is taken up with business matters often find their greatest pleasure in the company of a little child. The governor of an eastern state takes his little granddaughter as his constant companion whenever he goes golfing or fishing. The distinguished executive whose skillful management of the affairs of state has won national recognition is happier alone with the innocent, confiding little child than in the banquet halls of notables. There is a charm about youth and innocence that even the hardest heart cannot resist.
