"John, Where Did You Get That Bread"

A HOUSEWIFE ASKED

"John, where did you get that bread?" a housewife asked her hubby one morning at the breakfast table. "It makes such fine toast. I suppose it must be some of that kreamkrust from that Portland bakery."

"Why, no," replied John. "To tell the truth, I stopped in at the Electric Bakery and got some of their Faultless Bread. Will was telling me at the store that we were getting quite a little business from these people and I thought to myself that if they didn't sell their products to home people, pretty soon they wouldn't be able to buy anything from us. It seemed to me a business proposition to support an industry which spends its money with us."

"I spend so little for bread," responded Mary, "that it didn't seem to me that it would make any difference if I bought Portland or Eugene bread."

"I am not surprised that you felt that way, because there are so many who do, but if it were not for those who think that the little they spend for Portland or Eugene bread makes no difference, there wouldn't be any Portland or Eugene bakeries delivering bread here at all. Judging by the number of baskets I see out on the sidewalk awaiting the expressman, I have become convinced that if we all bought home made bread the bakery business at home might support a family or two more who would buy from our store."

"Well," acquiesced Mary, "I can see your logic and just so long as they make it as good as this outside bread, I'm certainly going to buy it. I've bought their pies and cakes many times and have always found them as good as any I could make."
