Make Waterfall Climb Hill. Scotland has some canny engineers who have succeeded in making a waterfall at Walkerburn work a turbine which makes electricity, then climb back up hill and come down again through the turbine with doubled power.

This miracle of thrift and engineering is accomplished by using part of the electric output for which there is no demand during the day to pump water back up the hill to a special reservoir. Then, when there is a big demand for current, the water is released from the reservoir and, added to the regular flow of the waterfall, doubles the flow.

Eugene Should Set Example. Eugene Register: Eugene ought to build an auditorium as its share of the university gift campaign. The five millions that will be contributed by others will be spent here, thus providing employment in Eugene, making room for new families here and keeping Eugene's building permits up in the list of metropolitan cities. Eugene will be the chief beneficiary of the building campaign, and what it does as its share will be carefully watched.

Besides, Eugene ought to have such an auditorium as is planned. This city is centrally located in Oregon. It is admirably served by railroad and stage lines.
