When Terrible Black Death Ravaged England

One of the first places in Europe where the black death appeared was at a small Genoese fort in the Crimea, the eastern extremity of the overland Chinese trade route.

The Tartars were besieging the fort at the time, and Chinese merchants took refuge there. The siege was lifted by the investing army, which fled from the plague, thus spreading the infection southward into Asia Minor, Syria and Egypt. Ships from the Euxine carried the contagion to Constantinople and to Genoa, and thence it radiated, fan-shaped, throughout the Mediterranean littoral.

In August, 1348, England's first black death victim succumbed in Dorsetshire. By November it had reached London. By the summer of 1349 it had dragged its pall of putrefaction over the entire island, including Scotland, Norwich, which had been the second city of the kingdom, dropped to sixth in size, more than two-thirds of its population falling victims of the scourge.

Cultivation of the fields was utterly impossible and there were not even enough able-bodied laborers to gather the crops which had matured. Cattle roamed through the corn unmolested and the harvest rotted where it stood.

Newspaper Story Well Worth Being Told Again

Perhaps it's because newspaper men are a clanish lot of lads and prefer, when not engaged in their arduous duties, to be of and among themselves to seeing the company of others, but it strikes this observer that those who are alien to the newspaper profession hear few stories respecting the activities of the boys from the paper offices.
