BOYS, CHAINED, ARE WALKING AROUND WORLD. If They Succeed in Reaching Paris They Will Find Key That Will Release Them.

Handcuffed together with a 22-inch chain, Christopher Graham, 19 years old, and LaVerne Squires, 22, members of a New York artists colony, are hiking west around the world from New York to Paris while the key which will unlock them travels in the opposite direction.

Never separated by more than the length of their chain, the youths, who were here Friday, will spend two years on the trip, crossing the Pacific from Seattle to Shanghai, visiting Sydney, Australia, and finally heading for Europe through India, Asia Minor, Egypt and Africa.

According to the terms of the wager which sent them upon the journey and which was made in the All Fools club of artists in New York, they must arrive in Paris by January 1, 1927. There they will find the key to unlock the chain that binds them.

The key will be taken to Paris by art students going there in the fall of 1926.

If they conform to all the terms of the wager they will be given three years of study in the Beaux Arts Institute of the University of the Sorbonne, Paris.

According to the agreement, the only mode of travel open to them are walking and accepting "lifts" from motorists.
