Temporary Deafness.

Awaiting her train, she sat demurely reading a magazine in the waiting room at the Union station. Across from her sat a "gay blade." His every action denoted a desire to flirt. The demure one apparently saw him not.

Nothing daunted, he walked over in front of the young woman and asked: "Didn't I see you get on the train at Sedalia?"

"What did you say?" replied the young woman, cupping her hand behind her ear.

"Didn't you get on the train at Sedalia?" came back the query in a slightly louder voice.

"I beg your pardon; I can't quite hear what you are saying."

By this time the first was rather flabbergasted. In a voice heard several seats away, his face a violent red, he shouted: "Did you get on the train at Sedalia?"

"Not that I remember," she answered.

The not-so-gay "blade," the cynosure of a grinning crowd, made a quick get-away.

A few minutes later a redcap approached.

"Your train is here," he announced, in a mild tone.

"Thank you," she replied. Her hand was not at her ear, either.—Kansas City Times.
