stream with the Scotland yard officer on board. There followed an exhibition of the marvelous skill with which the amphibious patrolers of London's waterway set about their "lawful occasions." Shown the spot by Roake, they got out their grappling-irons and, after only two abortive attempts, hauled inboard a ball of ooze and slimy mud.

"The juggins weighted it!" snorted the inspector, feeling the brick in the interior. "If he hadn't it would have been a mile downriver by now and would have led us the devil of a dance."

There were no facilities on the launch for examining the contents of the bundle, so word was given to return to the police station. There, on the slab in the receiving room, the unpacking took place, and Roake's eyes nearly bulged from his head when he extracted a stained suit of clothes and, wrapped in it, a sharp-pointed Italian stiletto.

"The clothes he wore and the weapon he used!" gloated the inspector, restoring the exhibit so far as was possible to its former semblance. "Good enough proof to pinch him on, anyhow, and blamed if I don't go and do it. He ought to have trickled back to his diggings by now."

Leaving the bundle in the safe custody of the river police, he walked to Jernyn street and interviewed the hall-porter of the flat he had watched all day. In answer to his question he was informed that Sir Guy Lathrop had not returned.

Roake hovered about till midnight and then, concluding that Sir Guy did not mean to return, he

"No, thank you, Guy. I'll let Klyne carry on."

Retreated to New Scotland yard and set in motion the vast mechanism that radiates therefrom for preventing wanted fugitives from leaving the country and for arresting them if they remain in it.

"Merely a matter of hours, but I should have preferred to have run him in myself," the inspector murmured.

Good Prospects. Two men friends who had not seen each other for months met in a restaurant one day. "By the way, old chap," said one, "how are you getting on with Ethel?" "Did you ask her to marry you?" "I did," was the reply, "but I didn't have any luck. She asked me if I had any prospects."

"Well, why didn't you tell her about your rich uncle?" said his friend. "Hang it all. I did," answered the other sadly, "and now she's my aunt."

Not the Same. "Crimson Gulch used to be the roughest little town on the map." "Long ago," answered Cactus Joe, "The boys have all reformed owing to a unanimous agreement that there weren't no sense to cuttin' up free gratis 'stid o' gettin' high salaries from the movies."—Washington Star.
