Squirrel's "L"

A telephone wire might be termed a public highway, but rather a highway of speech than one for transportation. However, this fact does not seem to be generally known, at least not among our animal friends. From Wilmington, Del., comes the story of a squirrel that travels a mile every day by telephone wire for its meals, crawling all the distance along the wires. William Krause, a grocer, some little time ago coaxed the squirrel down from a telephone pole by offering it nuts, and since then the squirrel has made its appearance every day. Out of curiosity, Krause followed it one morning and found that its nest was in the woods fully a mile distant.—Telephone Service Bulletin.

Little Known of Aesop

Aesop lived during the latter half of the Sixth century. The exact date of birth is unknown. He was a Phrygian; not a negro. Phrygia was a country of Asia Minor. Under the Roman empire, it was bounded on the west by Mysia, Lydia and Caria; on the south by Lycia and Pisidia; on the east by Lycia and Galatia, and on the north by Bithynia. Phrygians were probably a branch of the great Thracian family.

American Planned to

Save Ill-Fated Queen

The facts upon which are based the story that Marie Antoinette was to have been brought to this country by Stephen Clough seem to be these:

The mayor of Wiscasset, Maine, says: "The only basis that I have found for the report or legend that a plan existed to bring Queen Marie Antoinette to Wiscasset is that the ship Sally of this port, Stephen Clough, master, brought from France certain articles of furniture, etc., supposedly from a palace there which had been occupied by her. The bulk of the goods went to the possession of Col. James Swan of Boston, as will be seen by an article upon that family published in the Boston Transcript about seventy-five years ago, being one of a series of articles by Mr. Bowditch, which articles were known as 'Gleaner' articles ('Gleaner' being the signature to them), the articles being afterward reprinted by the Boston record commissioners in a volume of their reports, which report I do not remember and have not the set before me. It has seemed to me that the legend about the queen naturally grew out of the fact which I have referred to."

Abyssinians Hold Name of Saint George Holy

St. George seems to be the patron saint of the Abyssinians, for in their country there are a number of churches named for that personage.

One of them is carved out of solid rock and is a wonderful piece of work, having the appearance of hewn stone. There are beautiful arches and windows and some exquisite carving in stone. The structure is built in the shape of St. George's cross and the stone roof has a similar cross carved upon it. The building is very pretentious and of a size designed to hold and accommodate several hundred persons. It has a sacred pool on the premises which is said to have been filled with water from the River Jordan years ago and which has never evaporated. The story is one which is generally accepted by the natives, but incidentally a casual observer will see that the surrounding area is drained into the pool and that is probably what keeps the level constant.—Chicago Journal.

Whence Cocoa Comes

The cocoa plant is now grown in many districts of the tropical belt, and its consumption, in one form or another, has increased all over the world. It is an evergreen, and is equal in size to a well-grown apple tree. The pods, about eight inches long, grow out of the trunk, and are red, yellow, black and purple, according to the season. There are twenty or thirty pale red beans inside each pod, embedded in a soft white pulp. Cocoa groves are never planted solely with cocoa trees.

Although it grows best in hot countries, it is delicate, and has to be protected from the sun, and for this purpose forest trees are planted in the groves. Some of these grow to a great height and have a tufted head like a natural sunshade. These protecting trees are called "Cacao Madre," or cocoa-mother.

Insect Furnishes Shellac

Shellac is a modified form of lac, which is a resinous substance formed by an insect as a coating on the twigs and young branches of various trees in India and neighboring countries. The term "lac" is the same as the Indian numeral meaning 100,000, and is indicative of the myriads of insects which make their appearance with every successive generations. Lac encrusting the twigs as gathered is called stick lac; the resin crushed to small fragments and washed in hot water to free it from woody particles and coloring matter is known as seed lac or grain lac, and this, when melted, strained through thick canvas and spread out into thin layers, is known as shellac.

Got It At Last.

A mountaineer school teacher corrected a boy who had said, "I ain't gwine thar." "That's no way to talk. Listen: I am not going there; thou art not going there; he is not going there; we are not going there; you are not going there; they are not going there. Do you get the idea?" "Yessur. They ain't nobody gwine."

"Henry Ford sells steel, brass, leather and wood properly coordinated, at fifty cents a pound. Thereby he is able to pay a minimum wage of five dollars a day to American workmen. He does this with the aid of a manufacturing equipment unequalled in any European country."

"Be sure that there is nothing but love in your thoughts for God, for man, and for your work before you begin any special task. This is to put God into it, which means power for the execution and perfection in the result, that is the motive power behind all divine activity."—The Runner's Bible.

Red Rain Mystery

a fugitive from the charge of having murdered him," replied Guy as he pulled the door of his prison to him till it clicked into its normal position.

In the glad morning sun mine host of the inn stood beaming on the doorstep of his hostelry. His podgy hands stroked the paunch under his apron with great satisfaction. His honored guest, the Reverend Mr. Danvers, had curtailed his visit to London and had returned by the first train, so he had said on demanding breakfast. He had been absent only two days instead of the six he had threatened.

Presently Mr. Danvers came out and joined his host at the doorway. "Things pretty lively in town, sir?" the landlord inquired. "I found them so," was the dry response. "Not much doing in Cheverel, I suppose, while I have been away?"

"Nix, seeing as nothing happens in this village in a year and you ain't been gone forty-eight hours," said the landlord. "Come to think of it, though, you was inquired for by a nice young lady—Miss Larkin, the parson's daughter. If I might make so bold, you're a quick one to make friends, Mr. Danvers."

"Perhaps it wasn't me that showed the turn of speed," laughed the man in clerical attire.

"Well, she's general," accounted a rapid mover, but I've always held that she isn't a bad sort," said the landlord. "She doesn't have a rosy time with her old man, from all accounts. Lazy sweep, and as greedy for money as they make 'em."

Klyne nodded and stepped out into the road. Out of the tail of his eye he caught a glimpse of Margaret Lathrop entering the postoffice. He was not supposed to be known to her in his curate incarnation, but he very much wanted to communicate with her, as doubtless she did with him. The opportunity was too good to be lost. He, also, visited the postoffice and, going to the counter, bought some stamps.

During the transaction he saw that Margaret was in one of the partitions devoted to people who want to write telegrams. He went over and occupied the next one, affecting to fill up a form.

"I am so glad you are back," whispered Margaret. "Did you make any discoveries in town?"

"I confirmed certain doubts which had been worrying me," replied Klyne vaguely. "I am not able to report anything conclusive yet. I found out that the man who tried to kill me is still in this neighborhood—never, in fact, left it for more than a few hours."

"I could have told you that," said Margaret.

And she proceeded to narrate her terrifying experiences with the dog, and with the midnight visitant at her bedroom window. But, except to say that he had gone up to London, she did not mention Sir Guy or his unexpected return in the nick of time to defend her. That would have entailed disclosing the secret of the priest's hole, and she did not feel justified in doing so till she had obtained her lover's permission.

Klyne pondered a long time. "Well," he said at last, "you had better be armed in future."

And he smuggled into her grasp a small automatic pistol, noting that the postmistress, who was also a grocer, was busy slicing bacon for a customer.

"Are you really writing a telegram, or is it only camouflage," he asked.

"Camouflage. I saw you at the door of the inn and hoped you would see me and follow me here."

Klyne went on to describe his call at the rectory and Adela's treacherous letter introducing him to Mr. Wilfred Symes.

So absorbed were they in the interchange that they had shown no sign of having noticed that the third partition had been occupied for the last few minutes and that the occupant, who now stole quietly out of the postoffice, was the young lady under discussion. Once outside, Miss Adela Larkin strode briskly away, her hope lips twitching in a humorous smile—an acidly humorous smile, to speak by the book.

"Him a detective and never twigged me," she muttered over and over again till she passed through the rectory portals.

And then the horrid thought: "Had the male party to that overheard conversation manufactured it with intent to mystify the eavesdropper in the next compartment? Had he, after all, 'twigged' her as she stood at his elbow, separated only by a pane of ground glass?"

In the meanwhile the gentleman who was causing Miss Larkin such searchings of heart was taking leave of his client in the village street.

"Thank you so much," said Klyne. "You have given me a valuable item of information on which I shall proceed to act. Good-bye for the present, Miss Lathrop."

He raised his clerical hat and sauntered back to the inn.

"I shall have to draw on my wardrobe for a change of garments," he muttered. If Adela Larkin has spotted the Reverend Charles Danvers as Mr. Adrian Klyne the news may have been imparted. It is a pity that circumstances forbade my bringing a wider selection, but the check-suited boulder will have to serve. And I think I'll be an American millionaire."
