Many Famous Persons Had Defective Hearing

The customary callosity of authors to the afflictions of the deaf, was referred to in a lecture on "Deafness in Literature," recently delivered in London by Dr. Macleod Yearsley, a prominent consulting aurist. Doctor Yearsley said it was curious that one of the greatest human afflictions should often be dealt with so unsympathetically by authors. English literature teemed with pathetic blind characters, but deaf people were seldom mentioned except in a casual way and as a subject of humor. As a matter of fact, the deaf mute was a far greater sufferer than the sightless person. The only great British authors who made serious and successful attempts to represent the case of the deaf were Sir Walter Scott, Thackeray and Dickens. Speaking of authors who themselves suffered from deafness, the speaker mentioned Doctor Johnson, Harriet Martineau, Rousseau and Martin Luther. The last named, he said, was wont to ascribe the incessant head noises by which he was afflicted to the machinations of the devil. It would seem, therefore, that a competent aural surgeon, had he been available, would have been able to solve some of the greatest religious difficulties of the time.—Exchange.

Animals and Birds Have Own Domains

If you want a piece of land you buy it, but if a robin wants a garden he fights for it, and so long as he is fit he will continue to fight for it and drive off all intruders of his own kind. Other birds he tolerates, but no other robin, except his own mate, may invade his "property." Each fox has his own range on which he hunts, and other dog-foxes respect his rights. Badgers have their own territory. There are great earths in the Devonshire woods inhabited by badger families that have been there so long that mankind's oldest families are mere upstarts when compared with them! Golden eagles are very long-lived, and a pair will cling to the same eyrie for many years. Peregrines do the same, but these fine hawks have the curious habit of nesting in one place and hunting in another. Keepers declare that they never touch game in the neighborhood of their nesting-place.—London Tit-Bits.

Showers of Stars

Great showers of meteors or shooting stars have occurred on a number of dates. One of the most brilliant was that of November 12 and 13, 1833. On this occasion it was estimated that stars to the number of 240,000 fell in the space of nine hours, all from the same part of the heavens. Another great shower, though less intense, was observed in November of the following year. On November 13, and 14, 1860, there were other abundant meteoric showers, meteors falling at the rate of about 2,500 an hour. Observers have noted that these brilliant displays have occurred at intervals of about one-third of a century, the explanation being that a great cloud or distended stream of meteors revolves around the sun in that period, and that one portion of the elliptical orbit intersects that of the earth.
