Did it ever occur to you why all good business men keep a checking account with a bank? We'll tell you. It enables them to keep their funds in a more secure place than the office safe. It gives them a better standing in the business world. It enables them to pay their bills by check, the returned check being an undisputable receipt.

Individuals find a checking account very convenient and a source of saving. Money in one's pocket is often spent on the spur of the moment, while one is disposed to think twice before drawing his balance in the bank. Get the Savings Habit. Lay up for a rainy day. Start a bank account with

Red Rain Mystery

Begin Here Today.

SAMUEL HONEYBUN, retired English countryman, finds blood in his rain gauge on the morning of the murder of—

SIR FRANCIS LATHROP. Sir Francis' daughter, Margaret, had planned to marry Sir Guy Lathrop against her father's wish, and Sir Guy is suspected of the murder.

ADRIAN KLYNE, private detective, employed by Margaret, reads where blood is found in another gauge at Suffolk. He goes to investigate. Here he comes upon a wild fowler's hut in the marshes, and discovers—

ADELA LARKIN whose father, Rev. Larkin, has previously reported finding blood in his rain gauge.

KLYNE spies on the girl in intimate conversation with Silas Stampage. He leaves late that night and is released to see the girl starting for home on the same train.

Now Go on With the Story. Tired and dusty, Adela reached the rectory, on her return from the expedition to the scene of the third "red rain," late in the day after her departure. The Rev. Mr. Larkin was waiting for her at the gate. A telegram had proceeded her.

"Well, did you meet with success?" purred the rector.

"Rather!" rejoined Adela. "I screamed like hell."

"Come indoors and tell me all about it," said Mr. Larkin. For a clergyman he was singularly tolerant of his daughter's language.

Perhaps he was too used to it to be disturbed.

"Uncle Silas going strong?" he asked when they were within the haven of the study.

"A little too strong," replied the girl. "I conveyed the suggestion to him that he should repeat the trick. He thought it a good idea, but he had the cheek to propose that I should furnish the necessary fluid. That is what I meant when I said that I screamed. He looked so blood-thirsty that I simply had to place, too—a hut on the marshes—where we had gone for privacy.

However, I soon tamed him and he said he could manage all right without me. It is for tomorrow morning."

"Any sign of detectives?" queried the rector.

"Absolutely none. My journey down and back was quite uneventful. Anything fresh in these parts?"

"Not much except that that fellow Danvers has left the inn, though I understand that he has not finally given up his room. Inspector Roake is still there, and there is a rumor that he is hard on the heels of Sir Guy. He expects to make an arrest any minute."

"I hope he will," said Adela warmly. "I should just love to see that Roake man put his foot in it."

"What's that? I didn't quite catch you," snapped the rector.

"Nothing, nothing," Adela passed off the slip. "I was only wondering if Roake would pull it off. It would suit you all right if he did, wouldn't it?"

"It doesn't matter to me, one way or the other," rejoined Mr. Larkin severely. "You know enough of me, I hope, to be sure that I should regret any misfortune to the Lathrops."

Adela ignored the remark. She had come perilously near exposing to her father the side she had actually espoused in the Lathrop mystery, and that would not do at all. Following the train of thought induced by his hypocritical remark, she put the question:

"Have you seen anything of the Honeybuns or their new chauffeur?"

"Not of the Honeybuns. Wilmet brought a note of inquiry from the old man, asking if you had been heard from, which was absurd on the face of it. I sent back a verbal message that there hadn't been time, and that I didn't expect to hear till you put in an appearance. Hello, here he is again! They must have got nerves over at Lathfield."

Wilmet was tapping softly at the window, mouthing horribly through the glass at the inmates. Mr. Larkin threw up the sash.

"As you see, my daughter has returned," he addressed the monstrosity. "Tell Mr. Honeybun that it is all right. Everything will be done according to plan."

The creature could not have vanished more quickly if the rector had waved a magic wand over him.

"I don't like Wilmet," sighed the rector. "He is too sudden in his methods for me. Reprehensible of me to feel odium for a fellow-man, but I cannot help it. He causes nausea. Somehow I fear that he has a hold over my dear friend and brother meteorologist, Samuel Honeybun."

Adela regarded her size with cool disdain.

"I should imagine," she murmured, "that it is as reprehensible to feel suspicion as adium, whatever that may be. Personally, I shouldn't think it mattered much, what you felt against an ape like that."

The parlormaid knocked and entered.

"Inspector Roake has called and would like to see you, sir, if you are not engaged," she announced.

"Show him in," was the order.

"No, don't run away, Adela. It will save repetition if you hear what he has to say."

The Larkins' tranquility was rudely broken at the breakfast table next morning when the rector opened his Planet.

"Just listen to this," he hissed across the table and proceeded to read the paragraph which Klyne had dictated to Ted Knowles in Fleet street the day before:

"With reference to our announcement about the 'red rain' incident in our issue of yesterday, we are able to state on the most reliable authority that a detective engaged on the parent mystery has been at Ruxton in Suffolk and there recognized one of the individuals who has claimed his interest in connection with the Lathrop murder. Extraordinary developments are expected at an early date."

Adela's sensitive lips quivered.

"You must have been seen or heard," the rector accused her.

Meanwhile Klyne had come to the conclusion that little further was to be gained in the role of the Rev. Danvers. His landlord at the inn received a telegram from London announcing that Rev. Danvers had been summoned to Scotland, and that a check, covering his bill was in the mails.

In the honors accorded him in the infancy of this republic were shown the affection, the esteem and the trust in which George Washington was held by the people of his day.

As the years have multiplied, greater and greater tributes paid to the memory of the great revolutionary general and first president have spoken eloquently of the debt this nation acknowledges to this steadfast, far-visioned, resourceful leader—in truth one of the founders of liberty for the world.
