Fifty years ago the community was visited by a mild spread of "epizootic." Nowadays, in place of the "epizootic" we have the payment plan and the flat tire, the speed-bug, the detour and the road-hog.—Lafayette (Ind.) Journal-Courier.

The RED RAIN MYSTERY

HEADON HILL

Begin Here Today.

SAMUEL HONEYBUN, retired English countryman, finds human blood in his rain gauge on the morning of the murder of—

SIR FRANCIS LATHROP. Sir Francis' daughter, Margaret, had planned to marry Sir Guy Lathrop against her father's wish. Sir Guy is suspected of the murder by—

INSPECTOR ROAKE of Scotland yard. But Margaret employs—

ADRIAN KLYNE, who, posing as Lord Bulpeter, makes Roake think he is assisting in building up a case against Sir Guy, when in fact he is working with Sir Guy and Margaret. He has an ally in—ADELA LARKIN. But Adela's father, Rev. Septimus Larkin, and her uncle, Silas Stampage, who reported blood found in his rain gauge on two occasions, seem to be trying to defeat justice.

Now Go on With the Story.

Adela's eyes snapped fire. "Then," she said, "Mr. Roake has begun to suspect the Honeybuns!" But Lord Bulpeter shook his head. "On the contrary," he replied. "Roake attributes the manipulation of Mr. Stampage's gauge to the evil machinations of Miss Margaret Lathrop in defense of her cousin."

Adela burst into laughter. "How intensely funny!" she twittered. "And what do you think, Lord Bulpeter—that Miss Lathrop operated on a sheep or a goat in order to provide the new sensation?" "I am sure she did nothing of the kind," was the answer. "As a matter of fact, I have reason to be sure."

Suddenly, from an inquisitor Adela became her own sweet self—a coquette with a touch of hoydenish mischief. She laid her gloved hand on her companion's sleeve and pursed her lips at him. "I really believe that we are on the same side," she said. "Anti-Honeybun and pro-Lathrop. Also there is something else I don't believe. I don't believe that you are more entitled to mention in De-brett's Peerage than you are in Crookford's Clergy List."

Lord Bulpeter looked down at the upturned face, striving to plumb the depths of the limpid eyes. He was sore put to it to restrain an impulse to kiss the ripe red lips. "I cannot even guess what you are talking about," he said. "Oh, yes you can," came the speedy retort. "You are wondering whether I am actuated by ambition to become 'My Lady,' or by admiration for a very clever man."

"I would rather credit you with a stronger motive than admiration—whether for a peer or a clever man," said Lord Bulpeter quietly. And, yielding to the impulse, he stooped and kissed the provoking lips. He expected to have his ears boxed. It was a pleasant surprise when two shapely arms were flung round his neck and drew him closer. "Now I know that we are allies," cooed Adela. "Just as I knew it was you since last night in the library at the grange. Tell me how I can help you dish that odious inspector."

"By informing me why you went all the way to Suffolk to pay a one-night visit to Mr. Silas Stampage," was the uncompromising reply.

He prepared to pass on without being recognized, but he reckoned without his Adela.

Adela drew back, a little in awe of the speaker. She had only a minute ago secured this man for her lover and she was very conscious that she herself had loved him at sight. Yet such was the sporting instinct of the man-hunter that at the supreme moment of their romance he could thrust all emotion into the back ground and endeavor to strike a professional bargain.

"I will tell you everything," she said quite humbly.

Mr. Silas Stampage, like most retired notables who during the years of their fame and fortune have enjoyed the respect of their fellow men, set a good deal of store by the opinion of his neighbors. The invasion by gentlemen of the press, and the consequent notoriety accruing to the strange antics of his rain gauge, annoyed him greatly. It is true that he had a certain inside knowledge of the meaning of the phenomenon, but he wished that the same end could have been gained without so much publicity.

So when the card of "Detective-Inspector Roake, Scotland Yard," was brought in to him as he smoked his after dinner cigar he flew into a rage.

"So damned unnecessary," he concluded rather lamely as his anger petered out.

"He don't amount to much, sir," said the athletic footman who had parleyed with Klyne. "Puny little rat. Easy to chuck him out if you say the word, sir."

"We won't do that. You can show him in, Carter."

"That'll maybe be more cruel than the other way. Anyhow I'll stand by in case he howls for mercy, sir," grinned the sinister satellite of the one famous London surgeon.

"Get to it," snapped Mr. Stampage.

"I am sorry for the intrusion, which is rather in the nature of clearing the ground than personal to yourself, sir," began Roake. "It is that infernal red rain, as the penny-a-liners call it."

"I am as much in the dark as anyone," growled Mr. Stampage. "It is no use your cross questioning me about the beastly stuff. And I tell you straight, I don't like the looks of you."

Roake ignored the rudeness. It quite suited his theory that this unfortunate gentleman was a victim of the wicked Margaret Lathrop.

"I did not expect that you could throw any light on the affair, sir, but if you will state your view of it I may be able to relieve you by suggesting a solution," he said.

"My view is that one of my neighbors is playing the fool with me," rejoined Mr. Stampage. "Here, don't stand there on one leg. Sit down and have a glass of wine. That's better. Yes, some silly ass has been pulling my leg. Though why he should take the trouble to do it twice is a puzzle which I do not pretend to fathom."

Ronke nodded. "You have got half of it right, sir," he said. "But I can go you one better on the other half. It is no neighbor of yours who has been filling your rain gauge with blood. Would you mind telling me if anyone can gain access to the gauge from the road without being seen from the house?"

Have You Neglected This?

"Is it worth the money?" Do you ever ask yourself this when you are buying your needs?

Are the materials good and serviceable? Is the workmanship the kind that adds to the service the goods will give?

Do you ever consider these factors that decide whether a certain garment, a particular pair of shoes or some pattern in piece goods is really worth the price asked for it?

If you have neglected this, in all probability you have not enjoyed the full purchasing power of your money.

The next time you are making a purchase—whether it is in this or some other Store—carefully weigh the value you get for your money.

By heritage, madam, as a judge of value you and every American woman are without an equal. Do not neglect this important part of your shopping.

The First Message

"MR. WATSON, come here; I want you!" exclaimed Alexander Graham Bell on March 10, 1876, during an afternoon of experimentation, and over a wire connecting two rooms, the young assistant heard the words,—the first spoken sentence to be so transmitted.

Fifty years have passed. Today there are 17,000,000 telephones in the United States, giving voice to human need, as Bell's crude transmitter did then. Fire breaks out in the night; law-breakers invade a home; sickness strikes at a family circle. "Come here, I want you," is the summons, and the telephone speeds it on the way. Business of importance demands the decision of one who is on the far side of the continent. "Come here, I want you," is the summons again, and as if by magic, a personality is projected through space, questions are asked, answers given, problems solved—by telephone.
