Red Rain Mystery

of the C. I. D. walked down to the rectory and rang the bell. The summons was answered by the rector in person.

"They have all gone to bed," said Mr. Larkin in a tone of mild protest. He seemed dazed or sleepy.

"Miss Larkin gone to bed?" demanded the visitor sternly.

"I was referring to the servants," replied the clergyman.

"No, I do not quite know about my daughter. As a matter of fact

"Put up your hands," said Miss Larkin.

she is out somewhere. I am rather worried about her. She wasn't at home for dinner."

The visitor, who had already provided against contingencies by putting his foot across the threshold, stepped coolly into the hall. The rector, recognizing him, uttered a little squeal.

"Lord Bulpeter!"

"For a few days," responded the other calmly. "Now, Mr. Larkin, shut the door and take me where we can talk. Your daughter is in grievous peril and I must have your aid in securing her. It may conduce to frankness on your part if I tell you that the game is up. I have traced your connection with what is called the red rain mystery, and the connivance of your brother-in-law, Mr. Silas Stampage of Ruxton."

"Read that."

The sheet torn from Wilnot's pad, and intercepted by it's rightful owner, fluttered like an autumn leaf in the parson's quaking fingers. He handed it back after perusal with another appeal to the maker who ought to have been thoroughly ashamed of making him.

"Every Sunday in church," proceeded the visitor inexorably, "you mouth the words, 'When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness and doeth that which is lawful and right he shall save his soul alive.' That, I presume is equally applicable to a wicked woman, though I do not consider your daughter to have been wicked, Mr. Larkin. Whatever she did at the outset of this sorry business was done out of filial obedience to yourself, and latterly, having repented, she has been of the utmost service to the cause of righteousness. Incidentally she saved me from being killed at the instigation of your reverend self at the suggestion of your distinguished brother-in-law in Suffolk."

"I was sorely tempted, and so was Silas," wailed the unhappy cleric.

"Yes, by the money of Mr. Honeybun, who in turn was blackmailed by the scoundrel who has your daughter at his mercy. I had to handle him pretty roughly the other night, and I have no doubt that he is using Miss Adela as an instrument for revenging himself on me. That letter was meant to lure me to Hangman's heath tomorrow evening. He couldn't make it sooner, because if the letter had gone through the post I should not have got it in time. By a stroke of luck I got hold of it tonight and am prepared for instant action—if I only knew where to begin."

"Would you let me see that letter again?" Mr. Larkin whimpered. "Adela is nothing if not resourceful. If she guessed the man's purpose she may have devised a means of conveying information."

"For a few days," responded the other calmly. "Now, Mr. Larkin, shut the door and take me
