Towers Not Original Part of Westminster

Westminster abbey without its imposing twin towers is hard to conceive, but as a matter of fact they did not form part of the original building, not being erected until 200 years after the monastery had been dissolved. Sir Christopher Wren, architect of St. Paul's cathedral, commenced them, and he also designed the central tower and spire for the abbey, but they were never completed.

At one period it was customary for a corporal and nine soldiers to attend the abbey on Sundays to prevent interruption during services. This was in the time of the commonwealth when, for the first and only time since it was made in 1296, the coronation chair was taken out of the abbey in order that Oliver Cromwell might be installed as lord protector in Westminster hall.—London Chronicle.

Not All Affected Alike

The objects in a room which has been kept at an even temperature of heat will all be the same temperature, although some of them feel colder than others to the hand or fingers. For instance, the keys of a piano will feel colder than the wood of the piano case. The difference is due to the fact that heat or cold will run through some objects more quickly than through others. When you touch a thing with your fingers you supply some of the heat of your body to the object through your finger. If the object is the tiling on the hearth or the keys of the piano the heat runs through it quickly and you get a cold impression in your finger. On the other hand, you will get a warm feeling when touching up holsters or wood because the heat runs more slowly through them.

Disillusioned Barber

Sir Oliver Lodge, illustrating the light esteem in which scientists are held in some quarters, tells a story of an experience he had while visiting in this country. He arrived at a small town, where he was to address the members of the well-known scientific association. While the hotel barber was cutting his hair, he made several futile attempts to open a conversation with the great scientist. Finally he said, "What exactly is this association that's meeting here today?" The professor explained that it was a society of learned scientific men. "Oh," said the barber, in tones of evident disgust, "I thought it was a football team."

Why, to Be Sure

It was raining terribly. The playing field was a sea of mud. The players came up out of every scrimmage like pulling a sliver out of a mudhole. Everything was a mess. The football jerseys had lost their brilliant hues and the white pants of the officials were a dark gray shade.

Travelers Will Miss Old Dutch Windmills

The picturesque Dutch windmills are fast passing from the landscape of the land of dikes. The Dutch millers are modernizing their mills and turning to electricity. They are right, of course; but along with the great blades and stubby towers there will vanish much that is quaint and pictorial in tradition as well as in architecture, for the miller has made his mill, through many generations, show and express his joys and sorrows.

Always the Dutch miller has given his mill a name and called it by that; never just the "mill." When a daughter the household married, the mill was gayly adorned; when a member of the family died, the mill was put into mourning, and the degree of that mourning was governed by fixed rules of windmill etiquette. If the owner died, all the 20 boards in the arms of the mill were taken out, and the mill stood motionless for a given time, as if in grief over the loss of its owner. When the church bells tolled, marking the procession of the funeral from church or home to the cemetery, the boardless blades were turned, in unison with the bells. When the wife of the miller died, 19 boards of the blades were removed; for a child of the family, 13 boards; for the miller's parents, 11 boards, and so on down the line of relationships to the children of cousins, for whom one board was removed.—Youth's Companion.

American Writer Who Turned to Buddhism

It is common for people of other lands to come to America and become citizens of the United States, but we seldom think of Americans taking out naturalization papers and so becoming citizens of some other country. Yet one famous American writer did just that.

This writer was Lafcadio Hearn, who was really an American, although he was born on a Grecian island of an Irish father and a Grecian mother. At the age of sixteen he ran away from London, and then came to this country, where he worked on a number of newspapers. Later he was sent to Japan to write articles for a magazine. He became so fond of that country that he spent the rest of his life there, adopted the Buddhist religion, became a Japanese citizen, dressed in the costume of the country and married a Japanese wife.

Origin of Flowers' Names

The purple fox-glove, which blooms in its greatest profusion on Irish hillsides, is so called because it is believed that the fairies use these blooms for gloves during some of their ceremonies. The rosemary, an evergreen shrub of the mint family, is a native of the Mediterranean regions, and takes its name from the Latin word, rosmarinus, which means sea-dew. This is accounted for by the fact that when this shrub is seen in matted form it looks like blue-gray mist blown over the fields from the sea. The iris comes to us from the Greek word meaning rainbow. The primrose is derived from the Latin words, prima rosa, the first rose of spring.

By a Chinese Humorist

A master was teaching one of his pupils arithmetic. He asked him: "What is 1 plus 1?" The scholar replied, "I don't understand." The teacher said, "You certainly are a blockhead. Let me ask you again. You are one person. Together with me how many people does that make? Do you understand now?" "Oh, yes," he replied. "How many is it?" asked the teacher. "Two blockheads," replied the pupil.—Peking New Mandarin.

A Guide Needed

"What do you do when winter breaks up?" asked a man for whom Toofus had been guiding. "I may go to Niagara falls," responded Toofus, "and be a guide." "But what is there to guide about at Niagara falls? Everything is in plain sight." "A guide goes around with honey-mooneers," said Toofus, "and keeps them from walking into those falls."—Louisville Courier-Journal.
