Youth Rides West

to the rarefied atmosphere and my spirit to these entertaining new surroundings before I counted my money and thought of my material situation.

The Rocky Mountain News displayed columns of advertisements under the heading of "Help Wanted." I ran them over—"teamsters"—"railroad construction gangs"—"shovel gangs"—"miners." My eye grasped at this item. I took the matter to the clerk at our hotel, my bureau of information on all things western. I found that "miner" meant not a romantic prospect, following the trail of fortune, but virtually a common laborer in the dark bowels of the earth.

My face must have shown my spurt of dismay, for the clerk suddenly asked:

"You're educated, ain't you?"

"Yes," said I; and inhibited myself from saying how much I was educated. College breeding, I had found already, did not recommend a young man in the far west.

"If you hustle out there quick," said the clerk, "You can get a checking job in the grading gang out by Longmont. Friend of mine had it. Happen to know he's quitting today."

"Checking?" I asked.

"Keepin' time on the gang. Hiring and firing—mostly firing, nowadays," said the clerk.

I drove out to Longmont in a rented livery buckboard; making no more of a small matter, I got the job, buckled down to it with all the interest in the world. "With the boss, a taciturn and cynical old westerner whom I never came really to know, I 'batted' in a board shack. Uncommunicative as he was, he did teach me something about that essential western art, shooting. He himself handled a 45-calibre Colt's with such magic efficiency as to make me suspect that his silence concealed a past. The autumn rains came; there were light snows in the heights above, and they spread over the peaks a bridal veil which with each succeeding storm grew heavier. When it had become a blanket of snow, we finished our job and paid off. I was out of work, and I had but forty dollars ahead. Then luck served me another good turn. Settling up our business with Reichmann, the German grocer from whom we drew our commissary, I found that he needed a clerk. So next morning I was weighing sugar and learning to wrap bundles; and I had found on Curtis street a modest boarding place.
