Marriage Rites That Are Old as Humanity

The girl who today treads the aisle to the tune of the wedding march is still the victim of certain marriage rites so old that the idea originally underlying them has been forgotten. Her wedding veil, for instance, is a relic of the canopy that used to be held over the bride to shield her from profane gaze. The ancient Romans attached great importance to the custom of veiling the bride. Its primary object was to protect her against the evil eye, a superstition current among many tribes and nations.

With some people the veiling was required because the bride's own glance was considered to be dangerous. Misfortune would surely befall any person or animal the bride looked at before she had seen her husband on her arrival at his house.

From the early Romans is handed down the custom, not infrequently observed by an American bride of today, of being married in a previously worn marriage veil. Great luck is supposed to attend the practice, especially if the former wearer had been happy in the married state.—Eileen Bourne, in Liberty Magazine.

"Information" Tired of Old Man's Stale Joke

The new sales clerk who was "learning all about the store," had been placed by her section manager next to an information booth with instructions to "stay there and hear the questions customers ask."

They ranged all the way from the sensible to the insane.

The prize query came from a little elderly gentleman with a white beard.

"What floor's the basement on, eh?"

The new sales clerk stared. He didn't seem to be kidding; anyhow, one could never tell, and it was best to abide by the rule: The customer is always right even if occasionally crazy. So she said, "Over there," pointing to the stairs.

The little man walked away muttering, "What floor's the basement on, ha, ha." Then the information clerk, who had ignored all this, turned and said: "Didya see I didn't notice him? He comes around every month or so and asks that pet joke of his. Asked me the first time I was here; he always picks a new girl to spring it on."—New York Sun.

Wrestling Bouts in Japan

Every year the Japanese wrestling championship is decided at the Kokugikan in Tokyo, says the Pathfinder Magazine. Here the wrestlers from the east and west of Japan struggle for supremacy. The championship bouts, which are always picturesque, sometimes last for ten days or more. The matches begin early in the morning and last until late at night. Each wrestler has a stage name, like our actors. In fact, they are the heroes of the Japanese flappers, some of them being as popular as matinee idols in this country.

The wrestlers all use the "catch-as-catch-can" method. Each match continues until one man is thrown. The man who wins the championship becomes a popular national hero.

Common Phrase Explained

The origin of the phrase, "mind your P's and Q's," is not too explicit, but is supposed to have arisen in the reign of Louis XIV of France, when wigs of unwieldy size were worn and bows made with great formality, says London Tit-Bits. To do the salaam properly, two things were specially required: a "step" with the foot and a low bend of the body. It was an easy thing for the wig to become damaged by a clumsy bow—even fall off. To caution against this the French dancing master would say: "Mind your P's (pleads, feet) and Q's (queues, wigs)." ag10c

Snake Hunts Horseman

A youth on horseback rounding up cattle on the veld near Potchefstroom, South Africa, was confronted by a huge yellow snake, which reared up hissing in front of the horse.

He spurred his horse away, but the snake, moving with great rapidity, with the front portion of its body erect, closely followed for some distance, until it was finally shaken off.

This story is well vouched for. It interests naturalists and hunters, whose stories of people being chased by snakes are sometimes discredited.

The Hero

As a tall, athletic-looking young man entered the theater the whole audience rose and applauded.

"A popular hero?" asked a stranger of his neighbor.

"Yes," was the reply. "He distinguished himself when the circus was here."

"In what way?"

"A lion escaped, and when everybody was yelling and trying to get away, he walked quietly to the lion's cage and shut himself inside."

Warship Needed Mascot

The bad luck that attended the United States battleship Texas was attributed by old men-o'-warships to the fact that she had no mascot. Geese as mascots have a bad reputation with sailors. And most seamen believe that if a cat falls overboard and is drowned the vessel is doomed.

Pineapple Plant Peculiar

The pineapple plant produces one fruit and then dies. "Suckers," or shoots, become bearing plants for the following year.

A Yale player was teaching some cowboys how to play football. He explained the rules and ended as follows:

"Remember, fellows, if you can't kick the ball, kick a man on the other side. Now let's get busy. Where's the ball?"

One of the cowboys shouted: "Never mind the ball! Let's start the game."

The boat was sinking. The skipper rushed up to the crowd of scared passengers and asked: "Who among you can pray?"

"I can," answered the minister. "Then pray, parson," ordered the skipper; "the rest of you put on life preservers, for we happen to have only one short."
