He drove his car with extreme care. When a sign read "Speed limit 15 miles per hour," he obeyed it. He turned corner at one-third the speed the car was traveling. He stopped at all crossroads and waited for taxicabs to pass.

First Phones Tested

Power of the Lungs

There were many amusing incidents in the early days when Bell was at work trying to improve the telephone. At first persons had to talk so loudly in order to be heard over the telephone that it was said that they frightened horses that were out in the street.

On the night after Bell and Watson had talked for that first time over the marvelous distance of two miles the two young men, in their boarding house, talked so joyfully and danced so wildly that the landlady said: "You two will have to leave the house, if you can't be quiet at night!"

Then, too, in those first days of the telephone, foreigners who talked over it were amazed to hear it speak in their own languages. They seemed to think that since the invention had been made by an American, it could speak nothing except English.

The first telephone booth was made when Watson, remembering his landlady's scolding for the noise that he and Bell had made at night, rigged up a shelter of bed blankets and crawled under them in order to talk without waking the house. That gave the idea that led to the modern booths.

As for the familiar "Hello" so closely associated with the telephone, neither Bell nor Watson had thought of using the word. They always said "Ahoy" as if they were signaling a ship.—Frederick H. Law in St. Nicholas.

Device Called Upon

to Detect Balance

Detecting the unbalanced portion of any revolving mass, such as a flying wheel of an engine or a dynamo armature, is declared a simple matter by the inventor of a device that is called a "balance detector." The theory of the instrument is based on the principle that any revolving body or disk, perfectly balanced and loosely supported on its axis, will, when revolving, seek its own course of revolution and rotate steadily, irrespective of the course of its axis.

The device consists essentially of a case or housing. Through this runs an axle, universally supported, on which is a rotating disk. The bearing member protrudes from the casing, and when testing, is placed against the end of the shaft of the piece of machinery in question. This is allowed to rotate until it has attained the maximum speed of the shaft. In the casting is a pointer which shows the trend of the motion, greatly exaggerated. The machine is then stopped, with the device still connected, and pointer will then show the side out of balance.

Government Was in Luck

When the whites and Indians signed their first treaty in Minnesota, at Fond du Lac, now the extreme end of Duluth, 100 years ago, the Chippewas gave the white man the right to explore and remove any minerals found in what is now the great Arrowhead mining country. The whites had their eyes on the splendid copper prospects and were unaware that the adjoining country contained the world's greatest iron ore deposits. Hopes of discovering copper in sizable quantities soon faded, and it was not until half a century later that intrepid prospectors uncovered the first vein of iron. The provision in the treaty which so fortunately granted the government the right to the iron was made at a time, says W. E. Culkin, pioneer and historian, in the Duluth News, when there was no real knowledge of that metal.

Hawaiian Language

The Hawaiians had no written language until the coming of the missionaries in 1820, when the alphabet was provided to make possible translation of the Bible. It contains only 11 letters—a, e, i, o, u, k, l, m, n, p, w. The last is sometimes pronounced "v."

The Hawaiians improvised many foreign words with their limited alphabet, such as "popoki" for cat. This last from the native effort to repeat what the missionaries said of the animal: "poor pussy." It might also be noted that the nearest the Hawaiians could come to the common name "Jim" was their present translation of the name, "Kimo," pronounced kee-mo, with the accent on the first syllable.

Superstitious

As business was a little dull, two Florida bankers decided to take a holiday and go fishing. They found the cool shade of a stream, and dropped their lines. As they were sitting there contentedly a crowd of children came along and began to run noisily about them. One of the two bankers immediately jumped up and angrily ordered them off.

Said the other: "That's right, Jim, the noise is liable to scare away the fish." But he was surprised with the reply: "That's not it, I'm nervous. I have always been afraid of a run on the bank."

Sweden's Royal Band

The Royal band of Sweden, organized in 1527, celebrated its quadricentennial by reproducing the same program given for Gustav III, music, instruments, costumes and decorations.

When the band was organized it consisted of organist, kettledrum, pipe and four trumpeters, the trumpet being a popular instrument in that country, particularly after Charles IX gave royal funds for the development of the instrument and the training of the musicians.

Medical Optimism

The life of a man, a physician predicts, soon will be 100 years—a remarkable bit of optimism in view of the increasing auto production.

Young Men Are Lost On Snowclad Mt. Hood

(Special to the Sentinel.)

PORTLAND, January 3.—(United Press.)—Lost in a raging blizzard on the snowbound slope of Mount Hood, two Portland youths, Calvin White, 16, and Leslie Brownlee, 21, have been missing since Saturday. Apprehension is felt for young White, who is without food and was thinly clothed. He climbed to timber line Saturday with a party and beat his friends in a race down hill. When they arrived at camp he was missing and has not returned. Less fear is felt for Brownlee, who was warmly clad and had food. He became lost from other members of his party in much the same way as White, who is a son of Dr. Calvin S. White, former secretary of the state board of health.
