Rushing Waters Meet in Giant Whirlpool

Just before the junction of the Madre de Dios and the Inambari rivers in Peru the latter divides into two arms, with an island some two miles long between them. The right arm, which is usually the safer for navigation, is at times impassable, owing to excessive drought that causes the formation of perilous rapids. Travelers must in consequence take the wide left arm, down which the main volume of the river then flows.

An enormous force of water is shot into the Madre de Dios; the Inambari at its left arm junction is 300 yards wide, perhaps 30 feet in depth, and flows at six knots an hour. This great mass of water meets the Madre de Dios, itself 400 yards wide here, at a right angle. The current of the Inambari, being faster than the Madre de Dios, the former river cuts right across to the further bank. There the Inambari is thrown back and surges round in a huge circle 200 yards in diameter, to join up again with the water flowing to the bank. The whirlpool thus formed is probably one of the largest in the world. The circles of seething water curl inward and downward, screw-fashion, to their center, which appears as a great hole, at least six feet being below the level of the outer rim.

Birch-Bark Canoe Not Popular With Indians

Though the birch-bark canoe is the traditional vehicle of the Indians of northern Canada, few are to be seen today among those Indians frequenting trading posts or mining camps in Ontario or Quebec, writes Courtney Ryley Cooper in the Saturday Evening Post. There is an art in making a birch-bark canoe that only the old-timers truly know. Then there is work to it and "an Indian and unweary work are about as well mated as a bulldog and a black jaguar." Far better, if he can trap enough rats or coral enough ermine skins, he owns a chestnut canoe with an outboard motor, with which he can scoot along the streams and lakes in serenity and swiftness, while the wind waves his hair and creases a grin across his face, comparable only to an Oklahoma Cherokee enjoying his oil royalties and a new motor. There's only one thing more exciting, and that is to stand close enough to the track to get the balance in his eyes as he watches the transcontinental go by.

Finished

A traveling man put up one night in a cheap little hotel, where the thin partitions of a range of bedrooms, like the stalls of a stable, stopped halfway to the ceiling. And in the still watches of the night he lay awake and listened to the faintest demonstration of plain and fancy snoring that it had ever been his fate to hear. It was full of sudden and awful variations. Sometimes strangulation seemed imminent; then in the middle of a fantasia, the agony stopped suddenly, and there was silence.

From a nearby room he heard a voice exclaim wearily, "Thank goodness! He's dead!"

Lake Affected by Canal

Experts have decided that the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans mingle with the fresh water in Miraflores lake in the Panama canal. The progressive rise of a certain amount of sea water to this lake and in a lesser amount to Gatun lake began with the first ship to pass through the canal and will probably continue indefinitely with the operation of the locks of the canal under traffic. A rise also takes place when the gates are locked downward.

Time-Sense Center

Why is it that most of us beat time whenever a lively time is played? The reason, says the Swiss scientist, Hoepfl, is that the nerve centers which react to the sensations of hearing music are located in the feet at a point in each foot under the bend between the ankle and the toe bones. Moreover, the nerve spots which react to musical rhythm, he adds, are in the feet near the big toes. In the feet also are the nerves controlling the ability to dance rhythmically.

"Maru's" Proper Meaning

The Japanese embassy says that maru means, first, a sphere or circle, and, secondly, perfection, entirety, completeness. Expressive of perfection, it was formerly used as a suffix to the names of persons, sword masterpieces, etc., and to ships; but at present the last usage has become the common one. Thus the word maru, when used in conjunction with a proper name, may be said to designate a ship, it being the most popular suffix used in that connection.

Comedienne

Here's another one at Allentown. A visitor recently dropped in a restaurant on the "main drag" and after perusing the menu, ordered the native dish of sauerkraut and spare ribs. There must have been an unusually heavy run on that savory platter, for the Pennsylvania Dutch waitress shook her head and said: "All." Wishing to be funny, the man returned: "All what?" She: "All over." He: "All over what?" She, finally: "All over with."—Philadelphia Record.

Great Man Harshly Used

As a sorry blot on the appreciation of the world for men who have gained rightful fame, Columbus was sent home to Spain in chains from his second voyage to America. It was on November 5, 1500, that he landed.

Giraffe a Figure in Old Roman Pageants

The wonderful, long-necked, spotted creature, the giraffe, has an interesting history. Zoologists in deciding its actual species place it between the deer and the low-horned ruminants.

The name "giraffe" seems to be derived from the Arabian "zaphra," which by some is supposed to have been a corruption of "zorapha," the Egyptian for "long neck."

In the days of imperial Rome giraffes from the Libyan desert were exhibited in the triumphs of various emperors, and were probably shown to the Romans during the dictatorship of Julius Caesar.

From the period of the Roman empire till the close of the fifteenth century these magnificent animals were unknown in Europe.

In the last years of that century Lorenzo de Medici became possessed of a specimen, apparently perfectly tame, which was shown round in Florence, and as it was led through the streets often halted, and raising its lofty head to some high balcony, received some dainty fruit or confection—from the dwellers of the house before which it had staved its progress.

From that date till the reign of George IV no giraffe was seen in Europe until the year 1827, when Mohammed Ali, viceroy of Egypt, sent one as a present to the king of England.

Grim Death Lurks in Holy Waters of India

The holiest waters in India are polluted with a green and brilliant scum. Those who would bathe must break it, as hardy swimmers in our colder countries break the ice, before they can reach the spiritually cleansing liquid. Coming out of the water, bathers leave behind them jagged rifts of blackness in the green; rifts that gradually close, if no more pilgrims come down to bathe, till the green skin of the lake is altogether whole again.

There were but few bathers when we were at Pushkar.

On days of little concourse the bathers do not venture far out into the lake. Death lurks invisible under the scum, swims noiselessly inshore, snaps, drags down. We saw him basking on a little shrine-crowned island a hundred yards from land, monstrous and scaly, grinning even in his sleep—a crocodile. Pushkar is so holy that no life may be taken within its waters or on its banks, not even the manatees. A dozen pilgrims disappear each year between these enormous jaws. It is considered lucky to be eaten by a crocodile at Pushkar.—From "Jesting Pilate," by Aldous Huxley.

Something to Remember

One thing they have learned in cold Alaska is to make no attempt to clean a silk or woolen garment in gasoline in the winter time. Writing in Scribner's Magazine, Mary Lee Davis, the wife of an engineer, says that two women of her acquaintance were burned to death in so doing.

"Just the friction," she says, "of lifting the material from the gasoline produces such sparks in the electrified air that an explosion almost invariably occurs."

Although there isn't quite so much electricity in the air in this section of the country, there are few indoor sports more dangerous than washing articles in gasoline. If you must wash things in gasoline, do it outdoors.

Egyptian Spite

The childish trait of "taking it out" on an inanimate object when one has a fit of temper seems to have been a serious business in ancient Egypt.

An archeological expedition of the Berlin museum has just returned from Egypt with 200 pieces of pottery, fragments of some 80 clay vessels, all written over with the names of foreign princes and peoples with whom the Egyptians of about 2000 B. C. were at war, together with a number of Egyptian names as well, presumably of rebellious communities. These names, it is believed, were inscribed on the vessels, which were then shattered with suitable ceremonial, in the belief that the foes would thereby be injured.

Color Highly Important

Man has apparently become careless about one of the most important items in his environment—color. As soon as he realizes fully the inhibitive and repressive influence of drab, uninteresting color surroundings, the vistas about will be immediately transformed. Man has always conquered or changed conditions unfavorable to his best development. There is no reason to believe that he will not rise to the present situation and reinstate into his daily life the color which is so important to his well-being.—Exchange.

Best Way to Leave

An ambitious young man was being instructed at his own request by a professor of elocution in the art of public speaking. The professor knew that his vanity far exceeded his ability, so he gave him one last piece of advice: "When you have finished your lecture, bow gracefully and leave the platform on tip-toe."

"Why on tip-toe?" queried the would-be orator.

"So as not to wake the audience," was the quiet reply.

Heat From the Stars

The surface temperature of the red stars ranges from 2,500 degrees to 3,000 degrees centigrade. At the center, the pressure must attain thousands of tons and the temperature two or three million degrees.
