Unable to Put Trust in Alligator's Memory

Charles Ringling of circus fame, who died at Sarasota, used to collect anecdotes of Florida cracklers, poor whites and colored folk.

"One of Mr. Ringling's anecdotes," said a Sarasota realtor, the other day, "was about a cautious convert."

"There had been, you see, a colored revival, and the colored revivalist was about to baptize a batch of converts in one of those dark, silent, suspicious-looking streams that you find in our Everglades."

"Come," the revivalist said, as he stepped into the black water. "Come, follow me, brethren and sisters."

"But just then a couple of alligators raised their heads from the mud and opened their terrible mouths in a vast yawn. This caused the converts to step back with low cries of alarm."

"The revivalist rebuked them. 'Brethren and sisters,' he said, 'can't you trust de Lord? He took keer o' Jonah, didn't he?'"

"Yass, he did, pawson," said a convert sobberly, "but a whale's different. A whale's got memory. But if one o' dem 'gators was ter swallow dis coon he'd jes' go to sleep in de mud an' forget all about it."

Big Discovery Made With Crude Telescope

One of the capital discoveries of astronomy was made with a crude telescope in April, 1845. It was the discovery of spiral nebulae, by Lord Rosse, an English peer. His large telescope was erected in a country district of Ireland more than eighty years ago, for the most part with local labor, and it lacked all the advantages that modern machine tools now afford. Its long axis, supported upon a ball-and-socket joint, and sliding in chimes between two high walls of masonry, peered through the Irish mists. Lord Rosse could observe objects only when near the meridian and then at the cost of considerable effort. In modern instruments the apparent westward motion of the stars is counteracted by the steady motion of the telescope axis, which is turned slowly about a polar axis by a powerful electric driving clock. Lord Rosse, after the tube had been worked back and forth with a windlass until the tedious task of finding a celestial object had been completed, then had to keep it in the field of view by constant recourse to similar primitive contrivances.—George Ellery Hale, in Scribner's Magazine.

Good Answer

A business man who had been irritated beyond measure by solicitations for this and that—tag days, drives and charity advertising—so the story goes, was bitten by a dog. He went on to "business as usual."

When word got around his outer office, a couple of his irritants inquired seriously of him:

"You have just been bitten by a mad dog?"

"Yes, I was." (Business of not looking up.)

"What! And you came right to your office?"

"Yes. There was some writing I felt I just had to get done." (Business of going on writing.)

"Oh, I see. Writing your will, I take it."

"No. Writing the names of the people I am going to bite when I go mad.—Merle Thorpe, in Nation's Business.

Landmark on Old Trail

One of the early landmarks was Pawnee rock on the Santa Fe trail, in what is now Barton county, Kansas. This giant rock, standing on the level plain, was a noted spot for the trail near its base. It provided a place of rest and safety for many a traveler. In later years this landmark was disappearing.

The Woman's Kansas Day club resolved to save the historic spot and secured a deed for the rock and five acres surrounding it. On Kansas day, 1909, the women presented this deed to the state. This was done with the condition that the state spend $3,000 for improvements.

Diet and Cancer

The theory advanced by many persons that eating a natural or wild diet will prevent cancer has apparently been contradicted by recent experiments, reports Hygeia Magazine. When mice, the type of animals especially suited to cancer experiments, were placed on various diets, those fed the wild diet had the highest cancer mortality, and those fed on apparently unbalanced diet had the lowest. There was not the slightest evidence that fried or well-cooked food was associated with an increase in cancer.

Swiss Religious Founder

The Mennonites take their name from that of their founder, Menno Simon, a Swiss religious enthusiast of the sixteenth century, and they maintain, according to the Encyclopedia Britannica, "a form of Christianity which, discarding the sacerdotal idea, owns no authority outside the Bible and the enlightened conscience, limits baptism to the believer, and lays stress on those precepts which vindicate the sanctity of human life and a man's word."

Portents of Sneezing

In the ancient days of Greece and Rome a sneeze was supposed to bear in its train far greater portents than a mere cold. To sneeze while rising from the table or bed was said to indicate approaching death.

Yet, to sneeze between midday and midnight, under favorable planetary conditions, was an augury of happiness.

FORCIBLE EVACUATION PLANNED FLOOD AREA

MEMPHIS, Tenn., April 25.—(U.P.)—Forcible evacuation in Greenville, Leland and other flooded Mississippi towns has been ordered by General Green, commander of the Mississippi national guard. More than a hundred boats are being assembled at Vicksburg to carry soldiers into the flooded areas to bring out the residents.

More than 30,000 refugees in Greenville and other towns will be removed forcibly if they refuse to leave of their own accord.

General Green said: "We cannot permit these people to die from disease or permit them to be trapped by rising water."

The orders have been made necessary by the distressing conditions in the cities overcrowded by refugees from the flooded area.
