

Drake Story

conception couldn't go beyond that number.

"If you tried to count all the stars that you see, how long might it take you?" she asked.

"I guess it might take three months.

"You have looked through a telescope," she reminded, "and know there are other stars beyond those which you now see. Remember, it was only a small telescope; had it been bigger would you have seen more stars?"

"Yes, thousands more," I said.

"The bigger the telescope the more stars I would see."

"So, if you had the greatest telescope that ever could be built," she went on, "you would still be unable to see all of the stars. Beyond what you saw would be others and so on infinitely through space; and if you were up on one of those stars looking down at the earth you would see the earth as merely a moon or possibly a star. The earth is but a star in creation, and you are but one boy on the earth."

"The enormity of the thing, my own insignificance in this vast scheme of endless space, made my head swim. Then she continued:

"You can measure a piece of wood, a stone, or your own size. Anything one can measure is finite. But no man has ever been able to measure the universe, or space, because space, as you see, is without end, beyond our understanding. You can't comprehend any end to space, and yet you know there is space. We can't comprehend God, but yet we know He is."

The boy grew up under this teacher. As he was a finite being, she taught him, his existence in the human state would come to an end. He would be judged by the good he did during his limited time, a time which was but a clock-tick in the age of the universe. "The greatest of all good you can do is to bring happiness to those about you," she instructed. "Happiness is man's most cherished possession."

And with boyish ardor and with the faith of a son who loved, young Drake began to search his world for a life work that would promote happiness.

Since birth Drake had been afflicted with asthma. He has no recollection of having slept in a bed until after he was six years old. Throughout the greater part of his boyhood he had to sleep upright in a chair. Some of his finest work has been done in the night hours when sleep was an impossibility.
