Probably Only "Ghost" of Island on Record

I was staying in Oratava, Tenerife, with the family of the English chaplain there. One very sultry day he asked me to come up to the flat roof of the house, as he wished to show me something very remarkable. Finding I had strong and far eyesight, he asked me to count the islands I could see round the coast of Tenerife, and I found that, with Grande Canary, they numbered seven.

He then requested me to look through the telescope and name what I could see on the islet beyond Palma. And after I had specified a small palm tree, some low growth and a small white hut, he showed me the latest map of these islands—which did not include the island we had remarked: there were six only with Tenerife.

The old charts gave this island to Spain in 1479, but several years later surveys sent out to locate this island had failed to find it. Yet it reappeared from time to time in some particular state of the atmosphere—said to be a floating ghost of a submerged island.—London Post.

Successful Hotel Man Must "Know the Ropes"

Every big metropolitan hotel faces bankruptcy its first year. People are skittish about going to a new hotel no matter how fine it is until some one breaks the ice. For a few notables under its room soon after it opens for business. That is why free board and lodging frequently are offered certain celebrities who may be brought off that way. Once it is noted around that people of importance are putting up at a hotel the word follows. Then, of course, continued prosperity depends upon service standards maintained. The management always tries to create a prosperous air around a new hotel. One trick is to turn on the lights at dusk in every outside room. Employees circulate around raising and lowering shades to give an air of bustle and life. Page boys are instructed to shout important names to the lobby and dining room even if the owners of those names are in Europe. All these tricks help.

Disappearing Gulf

However slow and imperceptible the process may be, it is a well-established fact that the contour of the earth is changing constantly. Sea captains frequently note the presence of islands in midocean where no islands were ever seen before and just as often note the disappearance of islands. Points of land in the sea. The peninsula of Lower California, in the western part of Mexico, is, as most persons know, a long tongue of land following the coast line and forming the elongated Gulf of California. Recent observations show that the land of Lower California is raising, and accordingly increasing in width and at the same time the gulf is narrowing so that in the course of time the land of the peninsula may be joined to the mainland of Mexico and water now separating them will disappear entirely.

Flouting the Truth

There is no excuse for seventeenth of the mistakes men make. The world is full of certainties; the list is so extensive that almost everything is covered. What has happened in the past is warning for the future; and nearly everything about the distant planets—and we do—how much easier it is to know about our bodies, the habits of men collectively and individually, and of other things we may handle and taste. Men are actually tremendously clever; their trouble is that after discovering the truth, they say the truth is an outrage, and try to change it.—E. W. Howe's Monthly.

Historic Lighthouse

The old Cape Henry lighthouse, near Norfolk, Va., erected in 1770, the first of many that now dot the coast line of the United States. Recently because of its historical significance a pilgrimage was made to it by women's organizations of the vicinity. On the old lighthouse is a bronze tablet with this inscription: Near this spot landed, April 26, 1807, Capt. Gabriel Archer, Christopher Newport, Hon. George S. Percy, Bartholomew Gosnold, Edw. Maria Wingfield, with twenty-five others, who, calling the place Cape Henry, planted a cross, April 26, 1807. Del Gratia Virginia Condit.

Friends

We must, in great measure, take our friends as they are. If we are to have them at all, we cannot remodel any of them at will. When once we have accepted this fact, and the kindred fact that our friends are probably longing quite as feverishly to improve us, we shall get a great deal more pleasure out of our companionships, and escape much mental friction.—Great Thoughts (London).

Skills Serve a Purpose
