Writer Sees Religion

As Matter of Instinct

If an angel with a pen of light were to take a spiritual inventory of the heart of the people of our time, what would the record reveal? A medley, no doubt, of the faiths, feelings, fears, hopes, and doubts of a native religiousness, beyond which few ever go, mystic moods, moral edicts, relics of old magic, inarticulate longings, dark dreams, flashes of insight. In some, religion is a few things remembered from childhood; in others, a grim sense of duty unloosening hidden reserves; in others, a passing awareness, a moment of wonder when the spirit trembles with awe; in others, a thing of rote and ritual, punctiliously performed; in others, a soft shield to blunt the raw edges of reality; in others, a wisp of wiseness held together by a tenuous thread. In all of us, whether by lack or by loss, religion is more a quest than a conquest; a yearning rather than a realization; less an insight than an instinct. As Stevenson said of Burns, we are not so much devoted to religion as haunted by it. —Joseph Fort Newton in the Churchman.

Brickwork Made Use of by Builders Long Ago

Babylonian structures explored, either at Ur or at other sites, include three chief types of brickwork. One is a burnt brick much like the modern article, except that the burn is harder. The second is unburnt brick, possibly used for less important structures and resembling the adobe brick of the present. The third is a curved brick, like a part of a cylinder, apparently made during one period of Babylonian architecture, either because of some method of drying over rounded logs, or for some other reason now forgotten. To these three recent discoveries apparently add two still earlier types. The crossed brickwork—called the herringbone pattern—of some of the recently found structures and the clay lumps which are not yet bricks at all. Additional details will be awaited with interest by every one who is curious about beginnings of civilized man.—Kansas City Times.

Swallows Welcomed

Of all the feathered flock that swarm to Scotland's shores in spring or early summer none is more assured of a hearty welcome than the swallow. The first sight of it is always hailed with the liveliest satisfaction.

In many country districts the inhabitants believe that a wish expressed on first sighting a bird is certain to be fulfilled, so long as the wish is silently expressed and not confided to anyone else. It is a common belief among village maidens also that if they breathe their longings for a constant lover when they see the swallow for the first time they will have their hopes realized before the bird departs in the autumn.

Summer When Old Sol Refused to Function

From various records, including the famous diary of Charles Pierce, ice and snow appeared to have been mighty occurrences during the month of June, 1816. July, whose average temperature is said to have been less than 70 degrees, also experienced ice and frost. The mean temperature for the month of August dropped still lower than that of July, as much as an inch of ice forming on ponds during the colder nights, according to old chroniclers. Six inches of snow had fallen on the eighth day of June, and in some parts of New England, it is said, the ground remained white with snow throughout the entire summer. Crops were generally frozen out and ruined, although one story relates that the more resourceful farmers managed to save a little corn by keeping fires burning in their fields at night.—Kansas City Star.

A Love-Tree Lived On

Plymouth (Mass.) has a big linden tree which has an interesting history, recalls an article in the Brockton (Mass.) Enterprise, quoting the late William R. Davis, who spent his boyhood in Plymouth.

"The tree was planted by a youthful couple as a memory to their engagement, but not long afterwards, in 1860, the engagement was broken and the memorial was no longer prized by the girl, in whose garden it had been planted. She pulled it up one day and threw it into the street. My father picked it up and planted it where it now stands. He lived in the house known as the Plymouth Rock house, where he died in 1822. Under his careful nursing the tree survived and has grown into a beautiful tree."

Open House Is Lure For 750-800 Patrons

Exhibits of Various Departments Show How Young Idea Is Progressing.

Between 750 and 800 persons attended the second annual open house at the high school Wednesday night when work of the various departments was on display.

Each room was devoted to a display of department, the science, agriculture and typing exhibits drawing the largest number of persons. Each display showed actual school work.

One of the interesting displays of the general science department was a logging scene in miniature, the work of James Vashinder. It showed actual logging operations with spar tree, high line, donkey engine, logging train and logs. A drainage project was a feature of the agriculture display. Various experiments were shown in the botany room as well as mounted displays of woods, plants, butterflies and the like. The typing and shorthand rooms showed pictures drawn with shorthand characters and pictures made on a typewriter. A miniature of Caesar's famous bridge across the Rhine was a feature of the Latin department. The displays of other departments also were interesting. The central grade school building was also open for inspection and the work of the small children drew many persons.

At the close of the inspection a program of music and talks was given in the gymnasium. Cookies and punch were served by the domestic science department.

The junior class had the management of the open house.

Queer Coast Birds

On the Lincolnshire (England) coast flocks of small birds with ash-gray plumage, white breasts and thin, pointed bills, were seen.

They are the Arctic migrants known as knots, so called, it is believed, on account of the queer twisted posture they adopt when resting on the sands or mud flats. According to tradition, knots were the favorite birds of King Canute, and some people consider that it is from him that their name is derived. When Canute, a gourmet saint, was banished to religion as a punishment, he was banished to the rocks.

Smith-Hughes Boys Are Winners at Grants Pass

A good showing was made by the Smith-Hughes department of the Cottage Grove high school at the second annual vocational conference held March 28 and 29 at Grants Pass. W. S. Averill, local instructor, and 12 boys, George Keibelbeck, Phil Hersey, Alva Wakefield, Alvin McGarvin, Dalton Ward, Ed Graham, Merle Hockett, Linn Chapman, Edgar Hunt, Marvin Sutherland, Ernest Guggisberg and Lester Yearous, represented the department.

In the various contests, rope splicing, rafter cutting, soldering and milk testing, Ernest Guggisberg won first and Linn Chapman third in rope splicing, and Merle Hockett won second in rafter cutting. Thirty minutes was allowed for the rope contest which consisted of making the best short and long splice. In rafter cutting the problem was to cut a rafter for a 24-foot building, using a three-eighths pitch and ridge board. Thirty minutes was allowed for this contest. More than 30 students were entered.

The trip was made in cars furnished by Mr. Averill, Linn Chapman and Professor J. H. Gibson and his party of vocational education students from O. S. C. The latter group stopped at the high school Friday morning and inspected the department. On the way south the party inspected the poultry projects of George Hawley and Wesley Smith and the sheep projects of Bob and Ed Hunt and of Ernest Guggisberg. Professor Gibson pointed out to his students the practical nature of the projects and praised the work of the local department.
