IN SUNSHINE AND RAIN

Weather can not be permitted to interfere with the operations of a bank.

You may complain because there is too much rain, but you will always find your banker on the job to listen to your complaint and to remind you that business does not prosper where there is a shortage of moisture.

You may complain about too much heat, but again you will be reminded by your banker that heat is needed in order to make the moisture do its work.

In sunshine and rain your bank is on the job, and this applies to your financial condition as well. Seldom is any up and coming business concern able to finance every improvement and extension of business and the greater the amount of financial sunshine the greater the need for the service of a bank.

This old reliable bank has stood during the sunshine and rain of south Lane county for more than 30 years, and is still extending the oft-repeated invitation to business and private interests to take advantage of its checking and other services.

Better Homes In America

By Ray Lyman Wilbur

The distinctive qualities of American life are the outgrowth of the ideals and the careful training which have been inculcated through home training. The most profound influences upon the development of childhood are those exercised by parents. The health of the child is determined largely by the physical conditions of the home. Its character is molded chiefly by the instruction which it receives from its parents and by the example set in their daily lives. Thus, progress is to be attained chiefly through the improvement of the home environment and of the influences about growing children in the family circle.

The chief concern of all loyal citizens is to perfect the conditions of living so that all persons, and particularly those of the oncoming generations, may have every opportunity and inducement for wholesome growth in body, mind and character. This far-reaching responsibility leads directly to the improvement of home conditions. The city slum and the run-down rural district retard national progress. The unwholesome and destructive tendencies reflected in our crime rate are the inevitable product of low standards in housing and in family life. By taking thought it is possible to redirect the trends of home and community living, both through the improvement of our own homes in all their aspects and through concerted community activity.

We should not be content with anything short of the best. It is entirely practicable through thoughtful and painstaking community service to render all American homes healthful, safe and wholesome and to permit no exceptions to this rule. Such a process without doubt will take time, but the greater the wisdom displayed in the process the more rapidly the goal will be attained. Architectural beauty, well-kept and attractive grounds, convenient and comfortable interiors are as possible for the log cabin as they are for the city apartment or the suburban dwelling. Luxury is not essential to the development of character, but healthful environment, contact with beauty, and cooperation in the household for the fulfillment of high family ideals are universally essential.

Civility, like charity, begins at home. Thoughtful planning to achieve the finest values of life, therefore, begins in the family circle. It spreads through cooperative activity for the protection and beautification of the neighborhood, and for the perfection of community facilities and civic life.

Six thousand American communities, impressed with the profound importance of this program, have organized local better homes committees through which all local families and representative civic organizations, like the parent-teacher associations, are urged to cooperate. The national office of better homes in America, at Washington, will help to supply the local committees with the best available information as to methods of conducting the Better Homes campaign and with the findings of public or private institutions for research on matters of housing and home improvement. Through participation in this extensive program to coordinate all local efforts which aim at the improvement of homes, each citizen has an opportunity to make a practical and effective contribution toward the fulfillment of our greatest human responsibility—the building of a sound, sturdy, wholesome, idealistic home and community life.

Rev. Randle Speaks. Rev. Louis Henry Randle of the local Baptist church spoke Sunday afternoon on "Youth and the Work of the Church" before the convention of the Lane County Council of Religious Education held Friday, Saturday and Sunday in Springfield. A survey of religious education in the county showed that Cottage Grove was one of nine communities to have more than one Sunday school.
